PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 86th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1959

The 7th day of January being the day prescribed by Public Law 85–819, 85th Congress, 2d session, for the meeting of Congress, the 1st session of the 86th Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

RICHARD M. NIXON, of California, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father, God, who amid the toils of time hath set eternity in our hearts,

Summoned by a new year and a new session to face matters that pertain to the Nation's welfare, before we talk to one another and to a listening world, we would turn to Thee, without whose guidance and help our feeble hands will fail and our striving will be losing.

Thou hast ordained that in the leadership of public affairs the welfare of the many must ever rest upon the shoulders of the few. We beseech Thee in this high hour of beginnings to give humility, understanding, and the grace of receptivity to those who in Thy name and for the Nation's sake in this hallowed Chamber are entrusted by the people with the solemn responsibility of governance.

Grant that those who here speak and act for this last best hope of humanity, as servants of the common good, may meet every problem, every task, with patriotism undefiled, with integrity unsullied, and with hatred of all pretense and expediency, in the knowledge that all great and noble service in this world is based on gentleness, patience, and truth. Even in the clash of minds wrestling with thorny questions, grant us the art of disagreeing without being disagreeable, remembering ever that a soft answer turneth away wrath and that he who keepeth his own spirit is greater than he who taketh a city.

And so with faith in the Most High that opens for us all infinite resources, with faith in one another which bridges all cleavages of opinion, with a faith that the way of the Republic is down no fatal slope, but up to freer light and air, O Thou God of the nations, bring the dear country of our hope and prayer to—

The peace that comes of purity,
The strength to simple justice due.
So runs our loyal dream of Thee
God of our fathers make it true.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

CREDENTIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of Senators JORDAN, of North Carolina, and RANDOLPH, of West Virginia, elected to fill unexpired terms ending January 2, 1961, together with the credentials of the 32 Senators elected for 6-year terms ending January 2, 1965.

The credentials follow the form suggested by the Senate in all except two cases, which doubtless follow State forms.

If there be no objection, the credentials will be printed in the RECORD without being read, and will be placed on file.

The certificates of election were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and placed on file, as follows:

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. STENNIS, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, and Mr. FREAR, respectively, advanced to the Vice President's desk; the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President, and they severally subscribed to the oath in the official oath book.

The legislative clerk called the names of Mr. YARBOROUGH, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio.

These Senators, escorted by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, advanced to the Vice President's desk; the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President, and they severally subscribed to the oath in the official oath book.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10 O'CLOCK TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to announce for the information of the Senate that because of the fact that many Senators have been sworn in, and that they have scheduled engagements at luncheons during the afternoon, we do not anticipate any votes in the Senate. So far as the leadership is aware, we will have none.

I desire to make a brief statement later in the afternoon before the Senate adjourns, but at this stage I should like to ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it convene at 10 a.m. tomorrow. In other words, when we adjourn today, we shall adjourn to convene at 10 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, under what rule does the Senate now proceed in respect to this unanimous-consent request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the advisory opinion the Chair rendered at the beginning of the last Congress, it is the opinion of the Chair that until the Senate indicates otherwise by its majority vote the Senate is proceeding under the rules adopted previously by the Senate, but, as the Chair also indicated in that opinion, it is the view of the Chair that a majority of the Senate has a constitutional right at the beginning of each new Congress to determine what rules it desires to follow.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Will those who seek to have the Senate adopt new rules be, by their acquiescence, waiving the privilege which the Chair has specified if they fail to object to this unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the Senator from New York that the Parliamentarian advised me that Senators would not be waiving anything and that it would not affect the situation one way or the other. I consulted the Parliamentarian prior to making my request. The only purpose is to enable Senators to know that we expect the Senate to meet early.

Mr. JAVITS. May I say to the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will so rule.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Texas, and I thank the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas? Without objection, the request is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

SENATORS FROM ALASKA

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the credentials of the Senators-elect from the State of Alaska. The credentials will be read and placed on file.

The legislative clerk read the credentials of ERNEST GRUENING and E. L. BARTLETT, elected Senators from the State of Alaska, which were ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF ALASKA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Juneau.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 25th day of November 1958, ERNEST GRUENING was duly chosen, by the qualified electors of the proposed State of Alaska, a Senator from the State of Alaska to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for a term to be determined by authority of the said Senate, beginning on the 3d day of January 1959.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, William A. Egan, and our seal hereto affixed at Juneau, Alaska, this 3d day of January in the year of our Lord 1959.

WILLIAM A. EGAN,
Governor, State of Alaska.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] HUGH J. WADE,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF ALASKA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Juneau.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that on the 25th day of November 1958, E. L. BARTLETT was duly chosen, by the qualified electors of the proposed State of Alaska, a Senator from the State of Alaska to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for a term to be determined by authority of the said Senate, beginning on the 3d day of January 1959.

Witness: His Excellency our Governor, William A. Egan, and our seal hereto affixed at Juneau, Alaska, this 3d day of January in the year of our Lord 1959.

WILLIAM A. EGAN,
Governor, State of Alaska.

By the Governor:
[SEAL] HUGH J. WADE,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senators-elect will present themselves at the desk to take the constitutional oath of office.

Mr. BARTLETT, escorted by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and Mr. GRUENING, escorted by Mr. MANSFIELD, advanced to the Vice President's desk; the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Vice President, and they each subscribed to the oath in the official oath book; and they took their seats in the Senate.

TERMS OF NEW SENATORS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, as a Senator from the largest State in the Union [laughter] south of the North Pole [laughter], I send to the desk a resolution for the classification of the two Senators from Alaska, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 1), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes to which the Senators from the State of Alaska shall be assigned in conformity with the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires.

Resolved, That the Secretary put into the ballot box three papers of equal size, numbered, respectively, 1, 2, 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Alaska shall draw out one paper. The paper numbered 1, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 2d day of January 1965. The paper numbered 2, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 2d day of January 1961. And the paper numbered 3, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 2d day of January 1963.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to the resolution, the Secretary will place in the ballot box 3 papers numbered, respectively, 1, 2, and 3.

The Secretary placed the papers in the ballot box.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The two Senators from Alaska will now present themselves at the desk.

(Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. GRUENING presented themselves at the desk.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. By agreement between the two Senators, the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] will draw the first paper.

(Mr. GRUENING drew a paper from the box.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] having drawn the paper numbered 3, his term will expire on January 2, 1963.

(Mr. BARTLETT drew a paper from the box.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT], having drawn the paper numbered 2, his term will expire on January 2, 1961.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 2) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Texas and Mr. DIRKSEN to the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

Mr. DIRKSEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 3), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

Mr. MANSFIELD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 4) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian unless otherwise ordered.

AMENDMENT OF SENATE RULES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]; the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]; the majority whip, the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]; the chairman of the conference of the minority, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]; the chairman of the minority policy committee, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]; and myself, I send to the desk a resolution and I ask that the clerk read it, with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 5), as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out "except subsection 3 of rule XXII,", and (2) by striking out "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn" and inserting in lieu thereof "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "and of subsection 2 of this rule."

SEC. 3. Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting "1." immediately preceding "At", and by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a point of order.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not plan to debate the resolution today, nor do I expect to go into its details or merits. We shall have ample time to do that. But I want to give a brief explanation of the resolution for the benefit of the Members of the Senate.

This is a body of reasonable men and women.

Our continuing unity exceeds our passing division.

There is, I believe, full understanding among us on what will be our first order of business. Not all desire that this should be, but all do accept the fact that it will be, and that the Senate will proceed in orderly and dignified fashion until the matter is resolved.

The concern is with one rule in our body of rules. The concern is not with the full body of rules.

Some believe that rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate should be changed drastically. Some feel it should not be changed at all. Others among us feel that a constructive measure of responsibility can be added to the rule without a nonconstructive sacrifice of old standards of free debate.

Under any circumstances, it is the variance in our views on rule XXII that we come to reconcile, and we can proceed directly under the rules of the Senate to the issue at hand—rule XXII itself.

That is the purpose of the resolution I offer.

This resolution proposes that rule XXII be changed.

It would permit cloture of debate on the vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

It would extend cloture to motions to proceed to consider a change in the Standing Rules of the Senate. It would add a new paragraph to section 3 of rule 32 providing that the rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next unless changed as provided in the rules.

This is the same as Senate Resolution 30 of the last Congress, which I had the privilege of submitting for myself and some 38 other Senators.

The point is not simply the merits of this resolution in terms of what it provides, but, rather, that by making it the business of the Senate we proceed directly to the real issue. Each Senator can, individually, offer such suggestions as he may desire during the course of our deliberations. All views can be heard.

This issue has lingered overly long in our national discussions. The people expect us, as reasonable men and women to resolve it and, as responsible men and women not to create new issues in our wake.

I am, however, fully aware of the provisions of rule 40, which entitles the Senate to 1 day's notice in writing of motions to amend or modify a rule and that any Senator may insist upon the compliance with the rule.

If objection is presented, I shall file such notice and plan to call again for consideration of the resolution at the expiration of 1 day.

I hope that we may proceed on this course. I am sure that we shall give this issue the full consideration which it deserves. I am equally sure that we can—and will—as reasonable men and women resolve the issue so that the Senate may proceed to its important labors for the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of my resolution.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Under what rule will the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas be considered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas will be considered under the rules of the Senate which have been adopted previously by the Senate. But as the Chair stated earlier today, and as he expressed himself more fully in an advisory opinion at the beginning of the last Congress, in the opinion of the Chair the rules previously adopted by the Senate and currently in effect are not, insofar as they restrict the power of the Senate to change its rules, binding on the Senate at this time.

The Chair expressed that opinion in the last Congress, but it is only an opinion. The question of constitutionality lies within the power of the Senate itself to decide. The Constitution gives to the Senate the power to make its rules. That means that the Members of the Senate have the right to determine the rules under which the Senate will operate. This right, in the opinion of the Chair, is one which can be exercised by and is lodged in a majority of the Members of the Senate. This right, in the opinion of the Chair, in order to be operative also implies the constitutional right that the majority has the power to cut off debate in order to exercise the right of changing or determining the rules.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, again reserving the right to object, I wish to propound another parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Does the Chair, therefore, propose to rule at the appropriate time that paragraph 2 of rule XXII, dealing with the method of cloture, and paragraph 3 of rule XXII, which prevents cloture on motions to amend the rules, are inapplicable to the debate on the resolution of the Senator from Texas?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will at an appropriate time indicate his opinion that those rules are inapplicable insofar as they restrict the constitutional right of a majority of the Senate to determine or change the rules of the Senate. But the Chair will submit that question to the Senate itself to decide, because, as the Chair pointed out, it is a constitutional question, and the Chair lacks the power to make a decision on a constitutional question. He can indicate his opinion, as he has done, but the Senate itself must make the decision.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, again reserving the right to object, I wish to make a further parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. When will be the proper time to seek that ruling of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That time lies within the discretion of the Senators who desire to exercise the right which they consider to be theirs. If, for example, during the course of the debate on the motion of the Senator from Texas, which deals with changing the rules, a Senator believes that action should be taken and debate closed, such Senator at that time could, in the opinion of the Chair, raise the constitutional question by moving to cut off debate. The Chair would indicate his opinion that such a motion was in order but would submit the question to the Senate for its decision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if Senators will permit the resolution to be considered, I assume we will have the benefit of the opinions of most of the Members of the Senate, advisory or whatever else they may be, as well as the opinion of the occupant of the Chair at any time. All I wanted to do was to have the question before the Senate, so that the Senate might proceed to consider it. Each Senator may then present his own individual views and recommendations; the Chair, if he desires to do so, can submit his recommendations; and the Senate can give due consideration to them.

Mr. JAVITS. I have no desire, if the Senator from Texas will be so gracious as allow me to say so, to prevent the consideration of the resolution today because of the 1-day rule provided in the rules which are alleged to continue in force. I do, Mr. President, however, have the desire to raise the issue which has been raised in this colloquy, and with the President of the Senate, immediately upon serious consideration of this rule, because I do not believe we who oppose this resolution should run the risk of the ruling and the result of a ruling at some ultimate date when debate has gone on for some considerable period of time.

I shall object to the request only so that the matter may be worked out, if that is the desire of the Senator from Texas. I am, therefore, willing to have him work out, as he has always done so ably, a procedure by which the Senate's will, as to the constitutional question, may be determined before we enter upon a protracted debate. If the Senator would be able to work that out—and I am confident, certainly, for my side, that we shall be more than agreeable to any reasonable arrangements—I should certainly have no objection to going forward today.

I wish to make it clear that I have no desire to precipitate the matter today, by objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, the Senator from New York is seeking the opinion of the Vice President.

The Senator from Texas is seeking the opinion of 97 of his colleagues as to the kind of rule they desire to write.

I do not care to prolong the debate. If the Senator from New York desires to make a point of order, so that the Vice President may render his opinion first, the Senator from Texas will be glad to yield for that purpose at this time. If the Senator from New York does not, I suggest that he permit the resolution to be considered, and that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow. We shall present the resolution on its merits. No doubt amendments will be offered to it, and various points of order which may be conjured up may be raised.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York does desire to make the point of order. The legislative situation, as I understand it, is that there is pending a unanimous-consent request. Therefore, as I understand, that would have to be disposed of before I could make the point of order.

I should be glad to make the point, but I want to make it at the convenience of the majority leader, since the majority leader must have had a reason for bringing this resolution up today, and not waiting the 1 day provided by the rule, as referred to by the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator from New York will permit the resolution to come before the Senate, the Senator from Texas will immediately yield the floor to the Senator from New York, for the purpose of permitting him to make his point of order.

Mr. JAVITS. That will be agreeable to me.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me propound a parliamentary inquiry: namely, whether the resolution is subject to amendment in each of its several parts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the resolution would be subject to amendment in each of its parts.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Let me further ask whether the whole resolution is subject to having offered to it a substitute or an amendment in the nature of a complete substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be in order.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. A further parliamentary inquiry, and still reserving the right to object: On amendments to particular parts of the resolution, would a record vote lie?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If requested by a Member of the Senate present and approved by the requisite number.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I was very much interested in some of the observations which have been made, and I think that what will be the result of the consideration of this resolution should be made perfectly clear to the Senate.

I should like to ask the Chair whether he has held that after the Senate has agreed unanimously to consider the resolution, a point of order against the resolution can be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At any stage of the proceeding, a point of order can be raised against the resolution, according to the Parliamentarian.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the fact that the Chair has consulted the Parliamentarian at this stage of the proceedings. I hope that habit will obtain in the future, if it has not in the past.

I was interested in the matter, and I appreciate the Chair's statement that he might submit the constitutional questions to the Senate for consideration. Is the Chair going to decide whether they are constitutional questions? How shall we know whether they are constitutional questions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When a Member of the Senate——

Mr. RUSSELL. I am interested in what the Chair had in mind—whether he is going to rule, or whether he is going to let the Senate decide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes he has made his position quite clear. The Chair has always insisted that this question is a constitutional question. The Chair has only indicated his own opinion with regard to the constitutional question, but has indicated that in the final analysis only the Senate itself can make that determination.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am very grateful to the Chair for that ruling. The Chair has made a great many rulings, including the one in 1957 which declared the rules of the Senate unconstitutional. Of course I have been of the opinion that the Chair was a member of the executive branch of the Government who was given the duty of presiding over a parliamentary body; and that was the first time I had heard that the Chair exercised judicial powers, and could declare a rule of the Senate unconstitutional. But I assume that if that were done, the Senate might, on an appeal, have a right to pass on that issue.

I shall not object to the consideration of the question; but I certainly reserve my own opinion, as the Chair has apparently reserved his, as to the right of a point of order to be lodged against the constitutionality of a proposal which has been considered by the Senate by unanimous consent, and thus permit a unanimous-consent agreement to be set aside by a majority vote of the Senate. That is something which heretofore has never even been considered in the Senate. If there is a unanimous-consent agreement, it can be changed only by unanimous consent. And when the Senate agrees unanimously to consider this matter, I do not believe it is one which can be dislodged by any point of order which can be decided by majority vote.

Of course, the Senate can do anything; it can sit here and solemnly vote that black is white, if it wishes to do so, or vice versa. But when we agree to the consideration of the resolution, and it is before the Senate, I do not believe the Chair can dislodge it by any point of order, under any ruling of which I am aware.

Mr. JAVITS and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have no desire to cut off discussion, Mr. President.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from Georgia has stated that he intends to use a unanimous-consent request for the purpose he indicated, I am constrained to object.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I join in that objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I therefore send to the desk a notice of a motion to amend certain rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be read.

The motion submitted by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas was read, as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND CERTAIN SENATE RULES

In accordance with the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to amend rules XXII and XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate in the following particulars, namely:

Subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out "except subsection 3 of rule XXII," and (2) by striking out "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn" and inserting in lieu thereof "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting."

Subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "and of subsection 2 of this rule."

Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting "1." immediately preceding "At," and by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules."

The purpose of the proposed amendments is—

(1) To modify subsection 2 of rule XXII by reducing the number of votes required for the adoption of a cloture motion;

(2) To modify subsection 3 of said rule so as to permit a cloture motion to be presented on a motion to proceed to the consideration of any motion, resolution or proposal to change any of the standing rules of the Senate.

(3) To add a new paragraph to rule XXXII to provide that the rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey and Mr. JOHNSON of Texas addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to adopt its rules. I make the motion on behalf of myself, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. CARROLL, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. CLARK, Mr. BUSH, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. COOPER, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. BEALL, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. KEATING, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. LAUSCHE, Mr. MORSE, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. CANNON, Mr. HART, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MUSKIE, and Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey.

My motion is as follows:

In accordance with article 1, section 5 of the Constitution which declares that * * * "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings" * * * I now move that this body take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to ask what the parliamentary situation is and when I lost the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Texas had yielded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not want my motion displaced. Under rule XL, I have given notice I intend to bring up this motion tomorrow. Would not my motion have priority over the motion of the Senator from New Mexico? If not, I do not want to yield for the purpose of killing my motion.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me for a brief statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Chair would give me a ruling, I would appreciate it.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the Chair that the Senator from Texas, having given his notice——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am unable to hear the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the Chair that the Senator from Texas, having given notice that he intends to move to amend the rules, can call up his motion the next day. The Chair understands the present parliamentary inquiry is whether or not it is in order for the Senator from New Mexico to move, as he has, the adoption of rules. The Chair, therefore, has the opportunity at this point to rule whether the motion of the Senator from New Mexico is in order. But if the Chair understands correctly, the Senator from Texas has objected to the recognition by the Chair of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not done so as yet. I have asked the Vice President when I lost the floor. I understood I had been recognized. I understood I was standing at my desk when the Chair recognized the Senator from New Mexico. If the motion of the Senator from New Mexico is going to supplant my motion, that is one question.

Second, I do not agree that the Senator from New Merico has been recognized as yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is correct in saying he had the floor. The Chair had the impression, which may have been an incorrect one, that the Senator from Texas was yielding to various Senators, and that he was yielding to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No. The Senator from New Mexico did not ask me to yield. I think he will confirm that statement. Various Senators, reserving the right to object, expressed themselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the circumstances, the Chair is sure the Senator from New Mexico will recognize there was a misunderstanding, because the Chair had recognized the Senator from Texas, and was recognizing other Senators only as the Senator from Texas yielded to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wish to make it very clear that I do not want any other motion to take precedence over my motion. I was asking the Chair for a ruling that I had not lost the floor, and if I had, and the Senator from New Mexico had been recognized, whether my motion would take precedence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas repeat his inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator from New Mexico had been recognized and had offered his motion, would his motion take precedence over my motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Texas wants a ruling on that question, the Chair suggests that the Senator from Texas allow the Senator from New Mexico to make the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I had thought the Chair had been making various rulings pretty freely today. Previously I raised the parliamentary inquiry, which I repeat, Would any motion made by the Senator from New Mexico, or any other Senator, take precedence over the motion of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on the ruling——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Jersey for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to have a ruling, on my parliamentary inquiry, because I am prepared, as I informed the Chair in advance, to make a motion to adjourn, since I do not want my motion to be supplanted by any other motion. I have not yielded for that purpose. I do not intend to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will make a ruling with regard to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico if the Senator from Texas will allow the Senator from New Mexico to make the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Chair answer my parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In other words, the Senator from Texas does not want to give the Senator from New Mexico an opportunity to make his motion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Chair has been requested to give answers to parliamentary inquiries, which he has been freely disposed to answer in the case of other Senators. The Chair has not shown any disposition to reserve any advisory opinions. I am propounding as a parliamentary inquiry whether any motion made by any other Senator would take precedence over the motion I have made.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not until I have this question cleared up.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Any views which the Chair expresses would be an opinion only on a constitutional question on which the Senate has the ultimate power of decision. The Chair's opinion would be that any motion which has to do with the constitutional power of the Senate to make its rules can be taken up by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the Chair concluded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, pursuant to the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. JAVITS, Mr. MORSE, Mr. DOUGLAS, and several other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALLOTT voted in the negative when his name was called.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand correctly that if the motion to adjourn shall be agreed to——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did a Senator answer to his name?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rollcall will proceed.

The rollcall was concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness. I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] would vote "nay."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 73, nays 23, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Goldwater Neuberger

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 32 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Thursday, January 8, 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1959

This being the day fixed by the provisions of Public Law 819 (85th Cong., 2d sess.), approved August 28, 1958, for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the Members-elect of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress met in their Hall, and at 12 o'clock noon were called to order by Hon. Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the 85th Congress.

PRAYER

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., Chaplain of the 85th Congress, offered the following prayer:

Genesis I: 1: In the beginning God.

Most merciful and gracious God, in whose divine keeping and control are the coming in and the going out of all our days and years, we desire to begin, to continue, and to end this 86th Congress with Thee.

We worship and adore Thee as the supreme source and inspiration of faith and fortitude, of wisdom and understanding, and the guiding intelligence in the life of men and of nations.

Grant that on this solemn and sacred day, in the calendar of our Republic, all our citizens may invoke the blessings of Thy grace and favor upon our chosen representatives who have assembled in this Chamber to take the oath of office and the pledge of loyalty and service.

Hear us as we unite in offering unto Thee the prayer of the Prince of Peace:

Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. They will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever.

Amen.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The CLERK. Representatives-elect of the 86th Congress, this is the day fixed by law, pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, for the meeting of the 86th Congress and, as the law directs, the Clerk of the House has prepared the official roll of the Representatives-elect. Certificates of election covering the 436 seats in the 86th Congress have been received and are now on file with the Clerk of the 85th Congress. The names of those persons whose credentials show they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of the several States and of the United States will be called.

As the roll is called, following the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the State of Alabama, Representatives-elect will answer to their names to determine whether a quorum is present.

The reading clerk will call the roll by States.

The reading clerk called the roll by States, and the following Representatives-elect answered to their names:

ALABAMA

Boykin	Roberts	Elliott
Grant	Rains	Jones, Robert E.
Andrews	Selden	Huddleston

The CLERK. A certified copy of the Presidential proclamation indicating that the Territory of Alaska has qualified as a State pursuant to provisions of law has been received.

The clerk will proceed.

The CLERK. The rollcall discloses that 432 Representatives-elect have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Clerk will announce that credentials have been received showing the election of the Honorable JOHN A. BURNS as Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii, and the Honorable ANTONIO FERNÓS-ISERN as Resident Commissioner from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

The CLERK. The next order of business is the election of the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Nominations are now in order.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Clerk, as chairman of the Democratic caucus, I am directed by the unanimous vote of that caucus to present for election to the office of the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress the name of the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Clerk, by authority, and by direction of the Republican conference, I nominate for Speaker of the House of Representatives the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana to the 86th Congress.

The CLERK. The Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas, and the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, a Representative-elect from the State of Indiana, have been nominated.

Are there further nominations? [After a pause.] There being no further nominations the Clerk will appoint the following to act as tellers:

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK], the gentlewoman from Missouri [Mrs. SULLIVAN], and the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. CHURCH].

The tellers will please take their places at the desk in front of the Speaker's rostrum.

The roll will now be called, and those responding will indicate by surname the nominee of their choice.

The reading clerk will call the roll.

The tellers having taken their places, the House proceeded to vote for Speaker.

The following is the result of the vote:

ANSWERED "PRESENT"—2

Halleck Rayburn

NOT VOTING—5

Boyle	Reed	Teague, Calif.
Hoffman, Ill.	Taylor

The CLERK. The tellers agree in their tally. The total number of votes cast is 431, of which the Honorable SAM RAYBURN has received 281, and the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, of Indiana, has received 149. There were two Members voting "present."

Therefore, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative-elect from the State of Texas, having received a majority of all the votes cast, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress.

The Clerk appoints the following committee to escort the Speaker-elect to the chair: the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HALLECK; the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCORMACK; the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. VINSON; the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CANNON; and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HOEVEN.

(The Doorkeeper announced the Speaker-elect of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress who was escorted to the chair by the committee of escort.)

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, while, of course, I had hoped and wished on this occasion that we on our side had the votes to carry on through to a victory in this election, I must say that it is a high privilege and a great honor to present to my colleagues of the House a man who has proved himself qualified, as few men could, to hold the great office of Speaker of this body.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I might, with propriety, warn you that on our side, while we did not win on this occasion, we are going to do everything we can to see to it that our numbers increase the next time.

Yesterday evening it was again my pleasure to attend a birthday party given for our Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. There I saw again evidence of the high regard and esteem and affection in which he is held.

To be Speaker of the House of Representatives, in my opinion, next to being President of the United States, is the greatest honor any man can have; it is among the highest offices that any man can hold. While it is a signal honor to be Speaker of this body, likewise it is a heavy responsibility. I am sure that those of my colleagues who have served with me will agree with me that Speaker RAYBURN has, through his service here, upheld the best and the finest traditions of this body. To our new Members, who have not served here with him before, may I say that we have found him to be fair and just at all times and I am sure that they, too, will find him to be fair and just at all times.

Mr. Speaker, as we go through this Congress, of course it shall come to pass that we will have some vigorous contention concerning some of the matters to come before us. We shall contend on our side as best we can and you will contend on your side as best you can. And that is the way it should be. But let me say further and in the same breath, Mr. Speaker, that there will be many other matters concerning which we should undertake to bring about the closest understanding and cooperation for the welfare of this beloved country of ours. For myself and for the people on my side of the aisle, as will be the case, I know, on your side of the aisle, I am sure you can count on all of us to give you that sort of cooperation.

With that, Members-elect, I present to you the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, a truly great American, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. [Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER (Mr. RAYBURN). Mr. HALLECK, my colleagues of the 86th Congress, to say that I am not deeply moved and that I do not appreciate the high honor that you have conferred upon me for the ninth time would be out of class. I agree with Mr. HALLECK that this is a great office. Only 44 men in the history of the United States have had the honor to stand in this place and preside over the House of Representatives as its Speaker.

I approach this session of Congress and the position I hold in it with a feeling of great humility, with doubt always as to whether my decisions will be correct and in the best interests of our total country, but I pledge you now as I have in the past that if it is within my power, working with you, I will uphold the dignity and the prerogatives of the House of Representatives.

There is no such a thing as an upper and a lower House of the Congress of the United States. They are coordinate and equal, and this body will remain equal if I have my way.

We as Democrats have come from an election in which the people of America expressed overwhelming confidence in our ability to legislate for them. It is not a matter to boast about but it is a matter about which we should consecrate ourselves every day of this Congress. Realizing this high compliment that the American people have paid our party, we must realize that that brings with it tremendous, overwhelming, and almost crushing responsibility. We must act so and legislate so that our country will be better on the morrow than it was on yesterday.

We are going to be as nonpartisan as we are allowed to be. When the President delivers his state of the Union message on next Friday, we are going to listen to it attentively and sympathetically, trusting that he will advocate the things that we as Americans can go along with. We do not dislike Mr. Eisenhower just because he is a Republican. We do not disagree with him just because he is not a member of our party. But in conscience and in good will we shall try to carry out his program if in our opinion it is in the best interests of all of the American people; and on many, many of his recommendations I feel that we will be able to go along 100 percent.

We live in a day which, in my opinion, is the most dangerous period that civilization has gone through since the Man walked the shores 20 centuries ago and preached peace.

The United States of America, we want the world to know, does not covet a foot of ground over which the flag of any other nation flies. We want them to do like we want to do, to stay at home in peace and tend to our own affairs, without interference from any source on earth whatsoever. We are also willing for them to have the kind of government their people think is the best for them. In foreign affairs I trust that there will be no Democrats, there will be no Republicans, but we will all seek to do the things that will bring about the greatest prosperity to our country, and look forward that one day we may have a peace that will be universal.

Our efforts, therefore, shall be, cooperating with anyone anywhere who has his face fixed in front and whose feet are pointed in the right direction, to lead to a world of concord, a world of equal opportunity, and one day, under God, a peace that will be everlasting.

I thank you.

I am now ready to take the oath of office, and I will ask the senior Member of the House of Representatives, Hon. CARL VINSON, of Georgia, to administer the oath.

Mr. VINSON then administered the oath of office to Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS

The SPEAKER. According to precedent, the Chair will swear in all Members at this time.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, upon my responsibility as a Member-elect of the 86th Congress, I object to the oath being administered to the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. DALE ALFORD. I base this upon facts and statements which I consider to be reliable.

The SPEAKER. Under the precedents, the Chair will ask the gentleman from Arkansas not to rise to take the oath with the other Members, for the present at least. If the other Members will rise, I will now administer the oath of office.

The Members and Delegates-elect rose and the Speaker administered to them the oath of office.

ADMINISTERING OATH OF OFFICE TO DALE ALFORD

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 1) and move its immediate consideration.

The Clerk reported the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized and directed to administer the oath of office to the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. DALE ALFORD.

Resolved, That the question of the final right of DALE ALFORD to a seat in the 86th Congress be referred to the Committee on House Administration, when elected, and said committee shall have the power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to the subject matter of this resolution.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is in accord with existing precedents and, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on this resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, may I make an inquiry on a point of parliamentary procedure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, when the previous order has been moved and there is no debate, under the rules of the House are we not entitled to 40 minutes debate?

The SPEAKER. Under the precedents, the 40-minute rule does not apply before the adoption of the rules.

The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD], appear in the well of the House and take the oath of office.

Mr. ALFORD appeared in the well of the House and took the oath of office as a Member of the House of Representatives.

That Reverend Bernard Braskamp, D. D., of the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I have a substitute to the resolution, but before offering the substitute I request that there be a division of the question on the resolution so that we may have a separate vote on the Chaplain.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the election of Dr. Bernard Braskamp as Chaplain.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the minority substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Harry L. Brookshire, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That William R. Bonsell, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives;

That Tom J. Kennamer, of the State of Missouri, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Beecher Hess, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute.

The substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE].

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Will the officers elected appear in the well of the House.

The officers-elect presented themselves at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

NOTIFICATION TO SENATE OF ORGANIZATION OF HOUSE

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 4) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, has been elected Speaker; and Ralph R. Roberts, a citizen of the State of Indiana, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, your committee appointed on the part of the House to join a like committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House has been assembled and is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make has performed that duty. The President asked us to report that he will be pleased to deliver his message at 12:30 o'clock p.m., January 9, 1959, at a joint session of the two Houses.

PROVIDING FOR JOINT SESSION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, January 9, 1959, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The resolution was agreed to.

RECESS ON JANUARY 9, 1959

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday, January 9, 1959, it may be in order for the Speaker to declare a recess at any time subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 13) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the 86th Congress the Committee on Appropriations shall be composed of 50 Members.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTRODUCTION AND REFERENCE OF BILLS TODAY

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make a statement concerning the introduction and reference of bills today.

As Members are aware, they have the privilege today of introducing bills. Heretofore on the opening day of a new Congress several thousand bills have been introduced. It will be readily apparent to all Members that it may be a physical impossibility for the Speaker to examine each bill for reference today. The Chair will do his best to refer as many bills as possible, but he will ask the indulgence of Members if he is unable to refer all the bills that may be introduced. Those bills which are not referred and do not appear in the RECORD as of today will be included in the next day's RECORD and printed with a date as of today. The Chair feels that he should make this statement at this time so that Members of the House may understand.

ADMISSION TO THE JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS JANUARY 9

The SPEAKER. After consultation with the majority and minority leaders, and remembering the terrific jams we have had on the floor on occasion of joint sessions of the Congress, with the consent and approval of the floor leaders the Chair announces that on Friday the doors immediately opposite the Speaker will be open and the doors on the Speaker's left and right, and none other.

No one will be allowed on the floor of the House who does not have the privilege of the floor of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 2

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

Senate Resolution 3

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 14) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations and the subcommittees thereof be authorized to sit during sessions and recesses of the 86th Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION OF COMMITTEE EMPLOYEES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

House Resolution 15

Resolved, That standing committees of the House shall have authority to approve the employment and compensation of committee employees from January 3, 1959, or such subsequent date as their service commenced.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

RESOLUTION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN THE WEST INDIES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 10, 1958.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I take pleasure in transmitting to you the text of a diplomatic note dated November 26, 1958, from the British Embassy which quotes a resolution passed by the House of Representatives in the West Indies. The text of the note is as follows:

"Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires ad interim presents his compliments to the Secretary of State and has the honor to inform Mr. Dulles of a resolution passed by the House of Representatives in the West Indies."

The text of the resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That this Government notes with appreciation and gratitude the cordial greetings and affirmation of friendship received from the Government of the United States, as conveyed in Senate Concurrent Resolution 77 passed by the 2d session of the 85th Congress of the Government of the United States."

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

RESIGNATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

NOVEMBER 11, 1958.

The Honorable SAM RAYBURN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I regret very much that it is necessary for me to withdraw as a representative from the House of Representatives at the NATO Parliamentary Conference to be held in Paris next week.

I appreciate the honor you have bestowed upon me in appointing me to represent the House of Representatives at this conference and regret that this decision is necessary.

Sincerely yours,

EUGENE J. MCCARTHY,
Member of Congress.

APPOINTMENT TO UNITED STATES GROUP OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the order of the House of August 23, 1958, empowering him to accept resignations and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House, he did, on November 11, 1958, pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 689, 84th Congress, appoint as a member of the United States group of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentary Conference the gentleman from South Dakota Mr. MCGOVERN, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. MCCARTHY.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that subsequent to the sine die adjournment of the 85th Congress, the Committee on Un-American Activities reported to and filed with the Speaker statements of fact concerning the refusal of Donald Wheeldin and Harvey O'Connor to appear in response to subpenas and to testify before duly constituted subcommittees of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives, and that he did, on January 1, 1959, pursuant to the mandatory provisions of Public Resolution 123, 75th Congress, certify to the U.S. attorney, southern district of California, the statement of facts concerning the said Donald Wheeldin, and to the U.S. attorney, district of New Jersey, the statement of facts concerning the said Harvey O'Connor.

EMPLOYEES OF THE HOUSE AND THEIR RESPECTIVE COMPENSATIONS, ETC. — COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, which was read, and together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on House Administration:

JANUARY 7, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,

QUARTERLY REPORTS

The following quarterly reports were submitted for the third calendar quarter 1958:

(NOTE.—The form used for reports is reproduced below. In the interest of economy in the RECORD, questions are not repeated, only the essential answers are printed, and are indicated by their respective letter and number.)

FILE TWO COPIES WITH THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE AND FILE THREE COPIES WITH THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

"PRELIMINARY" REPORT ("Registration"): To "register," place an "X" below the letter "P" and fill out page 1 only.

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th
(Mark one square only)

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:
(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)
(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".
(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:
(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.
(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:
1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names or agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).
(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).
(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed, (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out item "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.◄

AFFIDAVIT

NOTE ON ITEM "D."—(a) In General. The term "contribution" includes anything of value. When an organization or individual uses printed or duplicated matter in a campaign attempting to influence legislation, money received by such organization or individual—for such printed or duplicated matter—is a "contribution." "The term 'contribution' includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution"—Section 302(a) of the Lobbying Act.

(b) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN EMPLOYER.—(i) In General. Item "D" is designed for the reporting of all receipts from which expenditures are made, or will be made, in accordance with legislative interests.

(ii) Receipts of Business Firms and Individuals.—A business firm (or individual) which is subject to the Lobbying Act by reason of expenditures which it makes in attempting to influence legislation—but which has no funds to expend except those which are available in the ordinary course of operating a business not connected in any way with the influencing of legislation—will have no receipts to report, even though it does have expenditures to report.

(iii) Receipts of Multipurpose Organizations.—Some organizations do not receive any funds which are to be expended solely for the purpose of attempting to influence legislation. Such organizations make such expenditures out of a general fund raised by dues, assessments, or other contributions. The percentage of the general fund which is used for such expenditures indicates the percentage of dues, assessments, or other contributions which may be considered to have been paid for that purpose. Therefore, in reporting receipts, such organizations may specify what that percentage is, and report their dues, assessments, and other contributions on that basis. However, each contributor of $500 or more is to be listed, regardless of whether the contribution was made solely for legislative purposes.

(c) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN AGENT OR EMPLOYEE.—(i) In General. In the case of many employees, all receipts will come under Items "D 5" (received for services) and "D 12" (expense money and reimbursements). In the absence of a clear statement to the contrary, it will be presumed that your employer is to reimburse you for all expenditures which you make in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Employer as Contributor of $500 or More.—When your contribution from your employer (in the form of salary, fee, etc.) amounts to $500 or more, it is not necessary to report such contribution under "D 13" and "D 14," since the amount has already been reported under "D 5," and the name of the "employer" has been given under Item "B" on page 1 of this report.

D. RECEIPTS (INCLUDING CONTRIBUTIONS AND LOANS):

Fill in every blank. If the answer to any numbered item is "None," write "None" in the space following the number.

REGISTRATIONS

The following registrations were submitted for the period from July 21, 1958, to October 20, 1958, inclusive.

(NOTE.—The form used for registration is reproduced below. In the interest of economy in the RECORD, questions are not repeated, only the essential answers are printed, and are indicated by their respective letter and number.)

FILE TWO COPIES WITH THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE AND FILE THREE COPIES WITH THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

"PRELIMINARY" REPORT ("Registration"): To "register," place an "X" below the letter "P" and fill out page 1 only.

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th

NOTE ON ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:
(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)
(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".
(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:
(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.
(ii) Employes subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:
1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names or agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

NOTE ON ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER.—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE ON ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).
(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).
(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, ☐ place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports.

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) Description, (b) quantity distributed; (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out item "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly" Report.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 8, 1959

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, Father of all men, who putteth down the mighty from their seats and exalteth the humble and the meek, without whom life has no spiritual source, no meaning above the dust on which we tread, but with whom there is power for the present and hope for the future; in this day of destiny, we seek Thee as our fathers have sought Thee in every generation, when the problems they faced were as frowning heights before their climbing feet. In this high and solemn Chamber of debate and decision, may the great causes that concern Thy human family, the selfless ministries that help to heal the open sores of the world, gain the utter allegiance of our labor and our love, as we march with fearless tread in the gathering armies of friendship whose armor is the shield of Thy truth and whose sword is the invincible might of Thy love, against which all the spears of hate cannot ultimately prevail. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 7, 1959, was dispensed with.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Fulbright	McNamara
Allott	Goldwater	Monroney
Anderson	Gore	Morse
Bartlett	Green	Morton
Beall	Gruening	Moss
Bennett	Hart	Mundt
Bible	Hartke	Murray
Bridges	Hayden	Muskie

Cooper	Kennedy	Stennis
Cotton	Kerr	Symington
Curtis	Kuchel	Talmadge
Dirksen	Langer	Thurmond
Dodd	Lausche	Wiley
Douglas	Long	Williams, N.J.
Dworshak	Magnuson	Williams, Del.
Eastland	Mansfield	Yarborough
Ellender	Martin	Young, N. Dak.
Engle	McCarthy	Young, Ohio
Ervin	McClellan
Frear	McGee

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives had assembled; that Honorable SAM RAYBURN, a Representative from the State of Texas, had been elected Speaker; and Ralph R. Roberts, of Indiana, was elected Clerk of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield time to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I strongly urge the Members of the Senate to support the motion of the majority leader to proceed to the immediate consideration of the resolution to amend rule XXII.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I urge such support regardless of any Senator's individual views on the specific amendment of rule XXII which is proposed in the resolution.

If the resolution is made the pending business of the Senate, each Senator will be assured an opportunity to propose whatever alternative he wishes, and to have the Senate express its approval or disapproval of such alternative by majority vote. We are assured, by the adoption of this motion, of an immediate opportunity to vote on a more strict rule of cloture.

This has been the objective which some Members have sought to reach by another means, namely, by a motion that the Senate proceed to adopt rules.

I suggest to those Senators who have supported such a motion in the past and those who were prepared to support it at the beginning of this Congress, that this objective—an opportunity to adopt a new cloture rule by majority vote—is achieved just as surely by the adoption of the motion of the majority leader that the Senate proceed to consider amendment of rule XXII.

Not only is our objective served by support of the motion of the majority leader, but we avoid what I sincerely believe are the very grave dangers involved in the motion to consider the entire body of rules. The arguments of past Congresses are compelling that the Senate is a continuing body but I have concluded that this is really a debate over semantics. For most purposes the Senate functions, and must function, as a continuing body for this is inherent in its constitutional place in the American Government. For some purposes where there is joint responsibility with the House the Senate is not continuing, but begins anew at the beginning of each Congress.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me for the purpose of propounding a number of parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. With the understanding, of course, that the Senator from Oklahoma does not lose the floor.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield with that understanding.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma by what right he obtained the floor?

Mr. MANSFIELD. My parliamentary inquiry is as follows: I should like to lead up to the inquiry by saying that I am in favor of the Johnson resolution, which I hope will very soon become the pending business. If it does become the pending business, will it be in order to offer a substitute to it in the form of an amendment, to be proposed by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the distiguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and other Senators?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be open to amendment and substitution by any action the Members of the Senate may desire to take in regard to it.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would be opposed to such a substitute proposal. However, if it is offered on that basis, then, under the rules of the Senate, we would vote, first, on the Douglas-Javits-Case-Humphrey proposal. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If an amendment or substitute is offered, such amendment or substitute would come before the Senate first.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Therefore the Senate would have a chance to work its will, on a clear-cut division of votes, first on the bipartisan proposal of the Senators from Illinois, Minnesota, New Jersey, and New York. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate so desires, it may so proceed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If Senators desire a yea-and-nay vote, all they have to do is to ask for it, and they will receive it. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Referring to the Anderson resolution, which I am also opposing, could that be offered as a substitute or as an amendment to either the Douglas or Johnson resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could be offered as a substitute.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On that basis, Mr. President, we could come to a clear-cut vote on that issue, if the Senate so desired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. So, according to the responses to the parliamentary inquiries which have been raised, it would be possible to act on the Anderson resolution by a yea-and-nay vote and on the Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case resolution on a yea-and-nay vote, before voting on the Johnson proposal, which, although it was offered first, might well be considered last. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator restate his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Does the Chair wish me to restate my inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On the basis of the rulings or the advisory opinions stated by the Chair, it would be possible, by a clear-cut yea-and-nay-vote, to vote on the Anderson proposal, and thereby say that the Senate is or is not a continuing body. If the Anderson proposal is agreed to it will mean that the Senate has the right to make its own rules with the convening of each session. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question could come before the Senate by a motion to lay aside the resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and then to propose the Anderson resolution to the Senate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. No; I must beg to differ with the Chair, on the basis of the opinions he has already rendered. The postulate I raised was that if the resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] were made the pending business—because, after all, it was offered first—then would it be possible to offer as a substitute the Douglas-Humphrey-Case of New Jersey-Javits resolution? If my memory serves me correctly, the Chair answered in the affirmative.

My next postulate was that if the resolution proposed to be offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] were offered, could it be offered as a substitute for or as an amendment to either the Douglas resolution or the Johnson of Texas resolution? Again, I believe the Chair answered in the affirmative.

What I am trying to have made clear is this: There has been talk of hijacking and blackjacking because the majority leader, by reason of his position, was recognized first yesterday and submitted a resolution. As I understand the rulings of the Chair, every Member of the Senate will have a chance to vote yea or nay on the Anderson proposal, on the Douglas proposal, and on the Johnson of Texas proposal. Is that not correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As to all three of the resolutions, we can express our will, we can make our choice known, and we can make the record clear, so far as we as individual Senators are concerned. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield for a further parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MONRONEY. Under the same condition on which I yielded to the assistant Democratic leader, I am happy to yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to ask under what rule the Senator from Oklahoma obtained the floor. Is the Senate operating in the morning hour? Is there any business pending before the Senate?

Mr. MONRONEY. I sought and received recognition from the Chair and was proceeding under that recognition.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then is recognition open to any Senator who may rise?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Having in mind the answers given by the Chair to the Senator from Montana to the effect that the Senate will have the right to pass its judgment on each of the issues raised, I now ask this question: By what number of votes would a measure be carried if the procedure described by the Senator from Montana were carried out? Would it be by a majority vote or a two-thirds vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Chair correctly understands the question of the Senator from Ohio, the adoption of a motion to lay aside the resolution of the Senator from Texas or the adoption of an amendment to the rules would be by majority vote.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Let us assume that the proposal of the four Senators previously mentioned came before the Senate. Would that proposal have to be carried by a majority vote of the Senators voting, or would its adoption require a two-thirds vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would require a majority vote.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Under the same conditions on which I yielded to the assistant majority leader, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

In reference to the parliamentary inquiries which were made by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], I wish to call the attention of the Chair to rule XL of the Senate rules of the 85th Congress, the rules which the Chair has said, at least for the moment, are guiding the operations of the Senate during this particular debate.

Do I understand correctly that the Chair has ruled that any amendment or amendment in the nature of a substitute to Senate Resolution 5, submitted by the majority leader, could be voted upon without the application of the language of rule XL which provides:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on 1 day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] would not require 1 day's notice under rule XL. On the other hand, if an entirely new question were presented, it would, in the opinion of the Chair, be bound by the provisions of rule XL.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Chair rule, or is the Chair of the opinion, that an amendment in the nature of a substitute would fall beyond the precise language of rule XL, and that the requirement of the rule would be satisfied by the fact that Senate Resolution 5 has laid over for 1 day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the substitute involved matters other than the two rules covered by the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas, it would be the opinion of the Chair that the provisions of rule XL would apply. On the other hand, if the substitute applied only to the rules covered by the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas, rule XL would not apply.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to propound a further inquiry. The Chair is familiar with the general proposition which was offered in 1957, and will again be offered in this year, 1959, by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON]. Would the language of that motion or amendment or amendment in the nature of a substitute, which is that the Senate shall proceed under the terms of article I, section 5, of the Constitution, for the purpose of providing rules——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The adoption of new rules.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The adoption of new rules. Is the Chair of the opinion that such language would qualify as being an amendment or an amendment in the nature of a substitute which could be offered to Senate Resolution 5 and be voted upon without the requirement, under rule XL, that it lie over for 1 day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, such a proposal would have to lie over 1 day under rule XL.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the Chair be so kind as to elucidate in some detail, for the edification of Senators who are deeply interested in the matter, the reasoning by which the Chair holds such an opinion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, as he has expressed it both yesterday and at the beginning of the first session of the last Congress, the rules of the Senate continue from session to session until the Senate, at the beginning of a session indicates its will to the contrary.

In the opinion of the Chair, also, however, any rule of the Senate adopted in a prior Congress, which has the express or implied effect of restricting the constitutional power of the Senate to make its own rules, is inapplicable when rules are before the Senate for consideration at the beginning of a new Congress.

It has been the opinion of the Chair, for example, that subsection 3 of rule XXII would fall in that category, because it has the practical effect, or might have the practical effect, of denying to a majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress its constitutional power to work its will with regard to the rules by which it desires to be governed.

On the other hand, in the opinion of the Chair, the requirement that any proposal to amend or adopt rules lie over for a day, under rule XL, would not have such an inhibiting effect. Consequently, the Chair believes that rule XL is one which can properly apply in connection with consideration of the rules by the Senate at this point.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If the Chair will indulge me for an additional moment, and with the cooperation and kindness of the Senator from Oklahoma, let me say that I ask these questions because I am in a quandary as to the ultimate meaning of the responses of the Chair to the inquiries of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], because I understood the Chair to say in response to the inquiries of the Senator from Montana that the Anderson proposal in the form of an amendment in the nature of a substitute could be offered to the proposal of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and could be voted either up or down by majority vote as soon as the debate terminated or as soon as the issue was called up for action.

Now I understand from the Chair that because of the nature and the fundamental scope of the Anderson proposal—namely, its reference to the provisions of article 1, section 5, of the Constitution and to the adoption of entirely new rules—it would fall under the proscription of rule XL, and therefore would have to lie over for a day.

I may be in error in my judgment or evaluation of this matter, I say most respectfully; but it seems to me that there is a conflict here which I believe it proper to have reconciled at this time.

I realize that our rights are not being cut off, and that the Chair in his rulings has protected the rights which we believe to be so fundamental in connection with the rule-making power. But some of us believe that a vote either up or down should be taken as of today, if debate can be concluded today.

The Chair now has indicated that if the proposal offered in 1957 were offered now—the proposal which the Senator discussed with the Chair and with other Members of the Senate—it would have to lie over for a day. Will the Chair clarify this point for my information? There is no argument on my part; I am interested in orderly procedure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is correct when he says that the Anderson motion in the opinion of the Chair would have to lie over for a day before it could be considered.

With regard to the various inquiries propounded by the Senator from Montana, the Chair understood that the Senator was referring to possible questions which might arise in connection with consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Texas. It was the intention of the Chair to indicate, for the benefit of the Senate, that the resolution the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] has offered, and which is open to amendment, provides the Senate with an opportunity to work its will on the provisions of the resolution in any way the Senate may desire to do.

On the other hand, the Chair did not intend to express the opinion that if a new proposal, such as the one the Senator from New Mexico has suggested, were presented to the Senate, and were moved as a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas, it would be treated as an amendment and would not be subject to the 1-day provision under rule XL.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish to thank the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me for a clarification?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me——

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield first to the distinguished majority leader, under the same conditions under which I previously yielded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if I correctly understood the inquiry of my able and distinguished friend, the Senator from Minnesota, I wish to say that the Chair has ruled that if the so-called Anderson motion, which was planned to be made yesterday, were made now, under rule XL it would have to follow the same procedure that the Johnson resolution did, and would have to lie over for 1 day. I wish to make clear to the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from New Mexico that I would not make any objection or point of order which would require it to lie over for 1 day. If the Senator from New Mexico desires to make a motion to displace or postpone or supersede the Johnson proposal to amend rule XXII and thereby broaden it, so as to take in all the rules, and to have no rules at all for a time, the Senator from Texas would not wish to be picayunish about the matter, and would not make any objection. Instead, he would agree to have that motion considered; he would even agree to a time certain to vote, if that was satisfactory to the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Minnesota.

As I have explained, I think, fully in detail, the purpose of my resolution—and, incidentally, I explained it for 2 hours to the authors of the various resolutions, the day before; and yesterday morning I gave them notice that I anticipated following this procedure—is to make it possible for the Senate to work its will to amend rule XXII if it desires to do so. I am aware that some Senators do not want to amend it. I am aware that some Senators want to amend it so as to have it provide for majority cloture. My proposal is to have it amended in such a way as to permit the imposition of cloture by the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, and to make cloture apply to rule changes, as well. But any amendment to that specific resolution is in order. Although the Anderson proposal is not in order, and although the rules—which I think are very sacred, and I am glad the Vice President has held that they apply today—would require that motion to go over, I certainly would have no objection to taking it up immediately, and, if agreeable to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, to entering into an agreement to let the Senate express its will today on the question of whether to proceed to displace the Johnson attempt to amend rule XXII by a motion which would embrace the adoption of an entirely new set of rules. If the majority decided it wanted to go into the rule-making business and wanted to consider each rule separately and to adopt a new set of rules, the Senate could work its will.

So I would not make a point of order. I would not request that the Anderson motion go over a day. I was sorry that on yesterday a request was made that my resolution go over for a day.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield under the same conditions I have previously stated.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. President, I am a little fearful that a part of the ruling made by the distinguished Vice President might be misunderstood if left unexplained at this time. Therefore, I propound the following parliamentary inquiry: Was there any intention on the part of the Vice President to indicate by his rulings that the customary rule in regard to perfecting amendments, if offered—namely, that they be considered before the consideration of amendments in the nature of a substitute—would be changed? Was there in the mind of the Vice President, when he made his earlier rulings, any intention to change that rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has very properly made the parliamentary inquiry. Perfecting amendments would have the right-of-way over amendments in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Chair.

Then, as I understand, the customary procedure in the Senate in regard to the order of consideration of amendments of various types would prevail; and although it is completely true that the proposal of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and other Senators, which is an amendment in the nature of a substitute, might be voted upon, if offered, by means of a yea-and-nay vote, if such a vote were requested by a sufficient number of Senators, there was no intention in any way to indicate that perfecting amendments would not be voted upon before that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perfecting amendments can be offered at any time while the motion or amendment in the nature of a substitute is before the Senate, and would have the right-of-way insofar as consideration is concerned.

Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. JAVITS, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia, under the conditions previously stated.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has stated on several occasions, and has reiterated this morning, that he is of the opinion that most of the rules of the Senate are applicable here today, and therefore are continuing. There are other rules, to which the Chair referred by rule and by number, as to which the Chair is of the opinion that they are not applicable, for the reason the Chair has stated—namely, that he thinks they are unconstitutional.

I should like to ask the Chair on what rule or what statute or what provision of the Constitution of the United States the Chair, as Presiding Officer of the Senate, relies for this attempt to exercise the right to select which rules of the Senate are applicable and which are not applicable, and which are constitutional and which are unconstitutional.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is bound by the rules of the Senate, as adopted by the Senate. The Chair also has a constitutional responsibility. The Chair has indicated on several occasions, moreover, that while it is the opinion of the Chair that the Senate rules, in the respects to which the Chair has referred, are not in accordance with constitutional mandate, it is only the Chair's opinion, and that question, if it is raised, will be submitted to the Senate itself for its decision.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Chair arrive at that conclusion of his right to render these advisory opinions under his constitutional position as a member of the executive branch of the Government, or in his status as Presiding Officer of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair renders that opinion in his status as Presiding Officer of the Senate. The Chair should point out he renders this opinion only in response to parliamentary inquiries which have been propounded by various Members of the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. They have been very freely propounded, and the Chair has freely answered; but can the Chair point to any precedent where any Presiding Officer of the Senate has sought to rule that any rule of the Senate is unconstitutional? I realize precedents are considered by some today to be obnoxious. Some persons today consider it indelicate to mention precedents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no precedent at hand, but the Chair points out that it is very common for Presiding Officers to indicate their opinions with regard to the rules of the Senate and other matters. If there is any doubt about it, the Chair suggests that Members of the Senate read the various briefs presented to the Presiding Officer on this question.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have labored through a brief which was submitted to the Chair, but I found in the brief nothing which, in my opinion, would give the Chair the right to declare a rule of the Senate unconstitutional. Of course, the Chair has a right to construe the rules and apply them; but to strike one down by an advisory opinion is, in my opinion, something new.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will allow the Chair to state his position correctly, the Chair has not been so presumptuous as to strike down a rule of the Senate. The Chair has been careful to state that he was expressing his opinion only as to constitutionality.

Mr. RUSSELL. It would be a rather effective death of a rule if the Chair were convinced it was unconstitutional.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that that is true, but the Chair has made it clear that it was only within the jurisdiction and discretion of the Senate to make the decision. The Senator from Georgia may disagree with the Chair's opinion, as the Chair realizes he does. The Senator from Georgia certainly has every right to express that opinion. But the Chair believes that when a parliamentary inquiry is propounded to him he should attempt to respond to the inquiry as fully as the facts seem to require response for the guidance of the Senate, and its consideration.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator from Oklahoma will indulge me for one more moment, I may say I am a great believer in free speech in the Senate of the United States, and I am perfectly willing to accord that privilege to the member of the executive branch who presides over this body; but I have had some question about the rulings of the Chair on rules of the Senate which have been developed in a period of more than 170 years—opinions that some rules were applicable, and that, in his opinion, some were inapplicable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Resolution 5.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate Senate Resolution 5, which was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out "except subsection 3 of rule XXII,", and (2) by striking out "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn" and inserting in lieu thereof "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "and of subsection 2 of this rule."

SEC. 3. Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting "1." immediately preceeding "At", and by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he will permit me to make a brief statement.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield, and ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to resume my remarks following the statement of the majority leader.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the Senator from Texas may proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to say that with respect to the motion proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] yesterday, or with respect to any motion he may intend to propose today, which involves submitting to the Senate the question of whether it wants to displace the Johnson resolution and go into the question of an entire new set of rules, I will be glad to ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider that motion today, without having it lie over a day under rule XL; and I make such a request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection——

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask the majority leader——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, has the Senator from New Jersey objected?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; he has reserved the right to object.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I hope it will not be necessary to object. May I ask if the request applies not only to today, but during the entire consideration of the amendment or the motion or resolution of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It means it would be in order to discuss and debate the question, and the Senate would have before it the motion of the Senator from New Mexico. Until a vote is taken on that motion, we shall have it before the Senate.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I have no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I think the proposal of the Senator from Texas is adequate. I shall today send to the desk a resolution that complies with rule XL. I may say the action of the Senator from Texas is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Mexico may make his motion.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, in connection with the reservation I propound a parliamentary inquiry. The Presiding Officer of the Senate has spoken a few times about the opening or the beginning of the Senate in terms of this session. I ask, therefore, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether the motion of the Senator from New Mexico to adopt rules will be considered a motion made at the opening of the session, within the words used by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, that would be correct.

Mr. JAVITS. As another parliamentary inquiry, because I think this was the point of my friend and colleague from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], may we know whether the word "today," which I think was used by the majority leader, perhaps inadvertently, had been excised from the unanimous consent request, so that the unanimous consent request applies to the consideration of the resolution which has just been called up by the majority leader?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The unanimous-consent request was to take it up today, instead of having it go over until tomorrow. That does not mean that when we conclude today we shall conclude deliberations on the resolution. We will not conclude them until we have a vote. I hope there will be a vote today.

I ask the Senator from New Mexico if he is prepared to join in the hope I have expressed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the Senator from Texas, he and I both have found that the debate will take quite a little time, and I am not in control of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to make clear that there is no disposition on the part of the majority leader to delay an expression of the Senate's judgment on this question.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] with the same understanding.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As one of the sponsors of the Anderson resolution, I may say that there is no desire on the part of the proponents of a sensible and reasonable modification of the Senate rules to delay action upon that very important proposition. If the Anderson motion is made the pending business, as has been suggested, very cooperatively, by the majority leader, we will proceed to good, constructive debate, and the resolution of the issue, in the hope that the Senate will exercise its constitutional right to adopt rules.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished minority leader without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] not propound a unanimous-consent request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas desire——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have not made the Anderson motion the pending business. I have asked that it be in order to consider it. I have not made such a request, because the Senator has not submitted his motion.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am just saying that we should have action on the unanimous-consent request which the majority leader has proposed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas desire action on his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator from New Mexico will submit his motion. Has the Senator submitted his motion?

I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may submit his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I have yielded to the distinguished majority leader for the completion of his unanimous-consent request, which is pending. After action on that I should like to ask unanimous consent to yield to the distinguished minority leader, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, may I ask one question about the contents of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. MONRONEY. Since I have yielded to the majority leader, I believe it should be an inquiry of the majority leader, in the time I yielded to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. In listening to what has been said about the request of the distinguished majority leader for unanimous consent, I am in doubt whether that proposal would give carte blanche authority to the Senator from New Mexico to introduce whatever he might see fit or, rather, would give consent to the Senator to submit his proposed motion solely as a substitute for the resolution which was offered by the Senator from Texas. I wish the Senator would clarify that point.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will say to the Senator that earlier in the day, while a quorum call was proceeding, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Texas met with the Vice President and discussed various parliamentary courses. At that time it was my understanding that the Senator from New Mexico desired to move to displace the Johnson resolution, and that the motion would contain language which would have the effect of having the Senate proceed to adopt new rules. I did not read the language, but the Senator changed it somewhat at the desk.

The first suggestion, I think, called for postponing the Johnson resolution. The second called for a substitute. I do not have the proposed language of the distinguished author.

All I desire to make clear is that I do not want to invoke rule XL and further delay this matter. I am willing to have the Senator submit his motion, and then I shall be glad to propound my request. Then the motion can speak for itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from New Mexico submitting his motion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] was in error in his statement a while ago, but I do not speak for the Senator from Minnesota. I think we did not have the understanding which he expressed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. To what statement does the Senator refer?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I submit the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read the motion.

The CHIEF CLERK. Mr. ANDERSON moves "that the Senate, in accordance with article I, section 5 of the Constitution which declares that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings' now proceed to the immediate consideration of the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator now state his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Anderson motion reads:

> I move that the Senate, in accordance with article I, section 5 of the Constitution which declares that "* * * each House may determine the rules of its proceedings * * *" now proceed to the immediate consideration of the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

It is the ruling of the Presiding Officer that we cannot consider the motion until it has lain over 1 day, under rule XL. Is that not true?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XL, it may be in order to consider this motion as a substitute for the Johnson resolution. If adopted, of course, it would displace the Johnson resolution and prolong debate even further, in my opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas? Without objection, the unanimous-consent request is agreed to.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. MONRONEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN] without losing my right to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I believe this is a good opportunity to clarify for the Senate a matter which was discussed yesterday and also today. It was referred to by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] today, and was referred to yesterday, as recorded in column 3 on page 9 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 7, 1959.

The language to which I refer, Mr. President, quoting now from the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, is:

> The Chair has made a great many rulings, including the one in 1957 which declared the rules of the Senate unconstitutional. Of course, I have been of the opinion that the Chair was a member of the executive branch of the Government who was given the duty of presiding over a parliamentary body; and that was the first time I had heard that the Chair exercised judicial powers, and could declare a rule of the Senate unconstitutional. But I assume that if that were done, the Senate might, on an appeal, have a right to pass on that issue.

I invite the attention of the Senate particularly to the word "declare," which appears in the paragraph twice. I am not aware that the Presiding Officer has declared any rule of the Senate to be unconstitutional. So far as I recall—and I went back to the earlier opinion of January 4, 1957—the Presiding Officer has always been very circumspect and very meticulous in apprising the Senate of the fact that he was only expressing an opinion and that wherever a constitutional issue was involved it had to be submitted to the Senate.

The long ruling to which I refer was given on the 4th of January 1957. It came about as a result of a parliamentary inquiry which was propounded by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. It appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 1, page 178. I do not believe I violate the spirit of the ruling by lifting two paragraphs from its context. At that time, as a part of the ruling, the Presiding Officer said—and I believe this is an appropriate place to insert it as a part of these proceedings—what I now quote from the ruling at that time:

> It is the opinion of the Chair that while the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another, the right of a current majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress to adopt its own rules, stemming as it does from the Constitution itself, cannot be restricted or limited by rules adopted by a majority of the Senate in a previous Congress.

I invite attention to the fact that the Chair was very careful to say, "It is the opinion of the Chair." The Chair made no declaration. The Chair made no categorical pronouncement. The Chair made no endeavor to take upon himself jurisdiction and authority to strike down any rule of the Senate. He was only expressing an opinion as the Presiding Officer. In that opinion, the Chair continued:

> Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule 22 in practice has such an effect.

That has been the nub of the controversy all along. It has been section 3 of rule XXII, under which cloture could not be applied with respect to a rule change. The Chair merely stated his opinion. He did not strike down that section. Obviously he does not operate in a vacuum as the Presiding Officer of the Senate. That duty is entrusted to him by the Constitution. It is not discretionary. The Constitution provides that the Vice President shall be the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Shall he give only a limited opinion in response to a parliamentary inquiry? Shall he withhold what is necessary for a proper judgment by the Senate when it passes upon a constitutional question?

In the same opinion in 1957 the Chair finally summarized what he had to say in this language:

> In summary, until the Senate at the initiation of a new Congress expresses its will otherwise, the rules in effect in the previous Congress, in the opinion of the Chair, remain in effect, with the exception that the Senate should not be bound by any provision in those previous rules which denies the membership of the Senate the power to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules.

There was no declaration. There was no effort on the part of the Chair to impose his will with respect to the rules as such. I have known no occasion during the time I have been a Member of this body when a constitutional issue was raised, when the Chair did not make it abundantly clear to the Senate that the decision on a constitutional question is the prerogative of the Senate itself. But is there any reason why the Chair should not express an opinion as to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of some section of the rule? His opinion is not binding upon any Member of the Senate. It is not directory. It is hardly advisory, as a matter of fact. It expresses only the opinion of the Presiding Officer, and nothing more. But I think he would be rather recreant in his duty to the Senate if he did not, upon the basis of opportunity to examine the precedents, to examine his own thinking, and to draw upon his own experience as the Presiding Officer of this body, acquaint the Senate with his opinion, and the basis for it, prior to the time when a constitutional issue was submitted for adjudication by the Senate itself.

I believe that in full justice to the Chair this summary should be included in this part of the RECORD, so that there may be no doubt that at no time did the Chair use the word "declare" or, by implication or otherwise, arrogate to himself any authority whatsoever to declare that there was something wrong, that there was an impaired rule, which was, in truth and in fact, unconstitutional. It would be a singular performance indeed for the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who is entrusted with this responsibility, not to acquaint the Senate with his opinion, and then let the Senate work its will.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Georgia under the same conditions under which I have yielded to other Senators.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question at this time. I hope the Senator from Illinois did not think I was unduly critical of the Chair. I was very critical of his ruling, with which I disagree, but I certainly did not intend to be critical of the Chair.

However, I have certain rights and obligations under my oath, and I have my own opinion as to the rules of the Senate. I shall not hesitate at any time to express my opinion, the opinion of any other person or persons to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I know how careful and meticulous the Senator from Georgia is, and I always highly respect his opinion. I know that statements made on the floor are read in the RECORD, and perhaps it is possible to misinterpret them at times. However, the word "declare" was used in the statement which the distinguished Senator from Georgia made yesterday, which I read this morning to refresh my memory. I thought it would convey an erroneous impression, and I thought the situation should be clarified at this time. I did not mean to be critical of my distinguished friend from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not mind criticism. I dislike to have it come from my distinguished friend from Illinois; but if it comes from him, I shall bear it, as my portion.

In my opinion, if a court handed down an opinion in the express terms in which the Chair ruled in 1957, there would be no question on earth but that the subject matter had been declared unconstitutional. I rely only on the language which the Senator from Illinois read. Reading from the opinion of the Chair of 1957:

> Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional.

If we were to strike out "Chair" and insert "Court", it would read:

> Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Court, unconstitutional.

That would render any act with which a court was dealing clearly unconstitutional; and it would be declared unconstitutional.

I follow with the other language which the Senator read:

> It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect.

If we were to strike out the word "Chair" and insert the word "Court" the language would read:

> It is also the opinion of the court that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect.

That would absolutely strike down and declare to be unconstitutional the subject matter before the court. I think that is even more evident in the summary which the distinguished Senator from Illinois read:

> In summary, until the Senate at the initiation of a new Congress expresses its will otherwise, the rules in effect in the previous Congress in the opinion of the Chair remain in effect, with the exception that the Senate should not be bound by any provision in those previous rules which denies the Membership of the Senate the power to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules.

Yesterday I thanked the Chair—and I hope the Senator from Illinois read that expression in the RECORD—for his statement that he would submit any constitutional issue to the Senate for determination. I do not wish to split hairs over technicalities. I had hoped that we would not go over this subject time and time again by way of parliamentary inquiries, because that issue is not involved at this time. But whenever an effort is made to have the Chair undertake to declare rules of the Senate unconstitutional, when I honestly and conscientiously do not believe the Chair has any right even to persuade the Senate that they are unconstitutional, I shall have to object.

I regretted that the question was raised yesterday. I did not raise it. I had not raised it since 1957; but I must say, in all candor, that I believe that, so far as the Chair was permitted or empowered to do so, he did invalidate rules of the Senate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Of course, a court has authority and jurisdiction to declare a provision of law to be unconstitutional. That is one of the attributes of a court. During my term of service in this body, when any question of this kind has arisen, I have no recollection of any occasion when the Chair did not make it abundantly clear that the question must be decided by the Senate itself. So the Chair has never arrogated to himself the authority to determine the constitutional question when a rule of the Senate was involved. I thought that was clear.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Chair did say that the constitutional issue should be submitted to the Senate. However, I recall that in the past a great many questions have been submitted to the Senate. During the past 6 years, in the tenure of the distinguished Vice President, there have been very few parliamentary controversies as to the application of the rules and the power of the Presiding Officer to influence the course of conduct in the Senate.

I will modify my statement by saying that the Chair declared that, in his opinion, the rules of the Senate were unconstitutional.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Oregon has been on his feet for a long time. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to him without losing my right to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall be very brief and shall close my comment with a parliamentary inquiry. First, I wish to join the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in expressing my very high compliments to the Presiding Officer of the Senate for what I consider to be the very able manner in which he is presiding over the Senate as we consider the very difficult procedural problem which confronts the Senate. I believe it will stand to his credit.

The Presiding Officer of the Senate serves in that capacity by direction of the Constitution of the United States. It is from that grant of authority that he derives his ruling power in the Senate. As the Senator from Illinois has pointed out, the Presiding Officer in 1957, and again in his rulings thus far in this session of Congress, has made very clear that in his opinion, as the Presiding Officer of the Senate and exercising his constitutional authority, article I, section 5, of the Constitution means exactly what it says, namely, that each House of Congress shall have authority to decide upon its own rules.

Therefore, in 1957, the Presiding Officer of the Senate said that under that section of article I of the Constitution, in his opinion, the Senate had the right at the beginning of a Congress to proceed to adopt the rules which it wishes to have binding upon it during that Congress.

He made it clear also in his ruling that in his opinion certain sections of the then existing rules of the Senate were in violation of the Constitution, in the sense that they aimed at denying to a majority of the Senate the power to determine its own rules. However, he said at that time, and repeated it again in meaning effect this year, that the issue as to the constitutionality of this particular section of the rules would by him be submitted to the Senate for its own determination. That is a very sound position for him to take, and I commend the Vice President for taking that position.

Mr. President, what is all this fencing and lancing about? I believe the procedural record has been made clear. What confronts us now is the question whether the Senate will, by exercise of majority rule in carrying out the business of the Senate, which I insist was clearly contemplated by our constitutional fathers, except in those particulars in which the constitutional fathers provided for other than majority rule in the Constitution itself, put itself in the position of invoking the basic majority rule principle of our form of government, and adopt rules which shall bring about an end to filibusters in the Senate. I believe that, on the record, I have a right to speak about filibusters. [Laughter.]

I have engaged in filibusters. I believe I am the only liberal Senator who has publicly confessed that he filibusters. I have done so in the past, and if the present rule is retained, I shall probably filibuster again in the future. I shall filibuster on the same principle on which I have filibustered in the past; never for the purpose of preventing the final majority opinion of the Senate from prevailing, but filibustering only long enough so, first of all, that the Senate may be apprised of what is involved in the issue. Sometimes it is necessary to speak at some length in the Senate, as my good friend the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] knows, when, in 1954, we filibustered against the atomic energy bill. As a result of that filibuster, we succeeded in adding certain amendments to that bill which would not have been added had we not engaged in prolonged debate.

As a result of that filibuster we stopped a steamroller in the Senate.

Second. The Senator from Oregon assures the Senate that he will filibuster to stop a steamroller in order to inform the American people as to what is involved in connection with a substantive issue before the Senate. However, after that time has elapsed, a majority of the Senate ought to have the authority, under the rules of the Senate, to end debate.

That is why I have always started a filibuster by offering the Morse antifilibuster resolution. Under that resolution the Senate would lay aside the pending business until the Morse antifilibuster resolution had been adopted, and that resolution provides that a majority shall be able to close debate. That is why I am in favor of the Douglas-Case-Javits proposal, because it provides for majority rule.

After one further observation I shall close by raising a parliamentary inquiry. It seems to me that in order to proceed with the problems facing the people of this country, the Senate of the United States should come to grips with the substance of both the Johnson proposal and the Anderson proposal. We ought to do it, not by seeking to take advantage of each other in respect to any rule which may or may not now be on the books, but with the clear understanding that, under the Constitution, as the Presiding Officer has ruled, a majority of the Senate has the authority, and ought to be recognized as possessing the authority, to adopt rules for the Senate.

If a majority does not wish to change the rules, as the Presiding Officer has made clear, nothing has been held thus far which would deny the majority the right to refuse to change the rules. If it wished to change the rules so as to require a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting to invoke cloture, three-fifths, or any other arithmetical formula, it should have the power to do so. This the Presiding Officer has made clear, and I commend him for it.

I now state my parliamentary inquiry. If we proceed with the Anderson motion today and come to a vote on it, can the Anderson motion be disposed of by a majority vote, or will it require a two-thirds vote? That is my parliamentary inquiry to the Presiding Officer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question would be determined by a majority vote.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Presiding Officer.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from North Carolina under the same condition, that I do not lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, does not a majority of the Senate have the power to alter any of its rules?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not this power of the majority of the Senate to alter any of its rules exist throughout the session of the Senate, as well as at the beginning of a session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. It being true that a majority of the Senate has the power to change any of the rules of the Senate at any time while the Senate is in session, I submit that it necessarily follows that the Senate can alter rule XXII, and that in substance rule XXII does not deprive a majority of the Senate of the right to exercise its constitutional powers, and that an advisory opinion or ruling to the effect that rule XXII is unconstitutional merely glorifies form and crucifies substance?

In other words, the majority of the Senate has the power at any time to alter rule XXII or any other rule of the Senate. Therefore, rule XXII of the Senate does not annul the right of the majority of the Senate to exercise its constitutional powers.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, without losing the floor, I may yield to the Senator from New York, who has been seeking the floor for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Oklahoma may yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise only because I think the statement made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] may lead us into some confusion. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken about the power of a majority of the Senate to change a rule at any time. I do not think anyone doubts that. But I propound this parliamentary inquiry:

If we go beyond the beginning of a session, and the rules of the Senate remain in effect, as the Vice President in his opinion has said they do, does not that include, therefore, rule XXII? Therefore, for the duration of the session, debate would be under the provisions of all of rule XXII, including paragraphs 2 and 3. But in the view of the Vice President, if action were taken at the beginning of the session to change the rules, would not the Senate be proceeding according to its right under the Constitution and, therefore, not be inhibited by paragraphs 2 and 3 of rule XXII? I make that as a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate proceeded to conduct its deliberations and its business under the existing rules, and by acquiescence adopted those rules, the Senate would be bound by the provisions of rule XXII for the remainder of this Congress.

Mr. JAVITS. Whereas the Vice President has said that, in his opinion, without a declaration, as my dear friend, the distinguished minority leader, made so clear, if the Senate proceeds at the beginning of a session under the Constitution, then the Senate would not be inhibited by those paragraphs so as to prevent it from changing its own rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the opinion of the Chair that at the beginning of a new Congress a majority of the Senate has the constitutional right to work its will with regard to the rules by which it desires to be governed, and that that right cannot be restricted by the membership of the Senate in one Congress imposing its will on the membership of the Senate in another Congress.

Mr. JAVITS. It has also been made clear this morning, as I understand, in a response by the distinguished Presiding Officer to a parliamentary inquiry of mine, that the Anderson motion and the Johnson of Texas motion are both within the confines of motions made at the beginning of a new Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is correct. The Chair may add one other comment. Once the Senate, either by acquiescence or by action, adopts its rules at the beginning of a new Congress, it is bound by those rules for the remainder of that Congress. This includes the rules governing changes in the rules.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair. I understand his statement very clearly.

I join with my colleagues in expressing great appreciation for the way in which the Chair has helped us all in the handling of this matter. I may say, with all deference, that he has helped the country by his views.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, without losing the floor, I may yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wanted to ask the Senator from New York to yield.

Did I understand the Vice President to hold that when new rules were adopted, that would conclude the rulemaking power of Congress?

The VICE PRESIDENT. For the remainder of that Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Did the Vice President mean by his statement that the Senate could not amend today the rules in accordance with the Johnson resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. What the Chair intended to indicate was that the Senate, for the remainder of a given Congress, would be bound by the rules which it adopted at the initiation of the Congress, including the rule with regard to changing the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct; but that would not conclude the rulemaking power of the Senate. We could amend the rules as I am attempting to do now. Is not that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is correct. The Chair would distinguish between the position of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress and during the Congress. At the initiation of a Congress, it is the opinion of the Chair that any rule of the Senate which inhibits the constitutional right of the current membership of the Senate to make its rules would not apply. During the course of the Congress, after the original decision as to adoption of rules has been made, the Senate would be bound by whatever rules it adopted whether by acquiescence or by action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But what I wanted to have abundantly clear in the record was that if the Senate in its wisdom, or lack of wisdom, should embark on a chase for a new set of rules and operate for a period without any rules, and if when we wrote those rules we included rule XL as it is now written in the rules, we could always amend the rules from time to time by a majority vote, provided we got that vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. ERVIN. I believe the Chair, as a result of the question asked by the majority leader, has corrected what I considered to be an inconsistency between the statement of the Chair to me and the statement of the Chair to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

As I understood the Chair to say in substance, when the Senate once adopts or acquiesces in rules, those rules remain in force, but they are subject to being changed at any time, in any respect, by a majority of the Senate during the continuance of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Oklahoma may yield to me without losing his right to the floor, so that I may propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, with that understanding, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am one of those who feel that great clarification has been brought about this morning by the rulings of the Chair as to the precise meaning of the questions which are before the Senate. Before asking the question which I have in mind, I wish to refer to the Constitution of the United States. I shall read to the Senate, so that all may hear, from section 5, article I. It will be remembered that article I is the very first article of the Constitution, and is the article which deals with the legislative power of the U.S. Government. It places all legislative power in Congress.

Clauses 2 and 3 of section 5, article I, read as follows:

> 2. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.
> 3. Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy—

I call the attention of the Presiding Officer to the fact that three rules of procedure with respect to the power of each House of the Congress are laid down here: First, that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; second, that, by the concurrence of two thirds, either House may expel a Member; and, third, that each House—meaning both the House and the Senate—shall keep a journal of its proceedings.

The first clause is permissive; it does not say when or where or how the respective Houses may determine their rules.

The third clause is mandatory; each House shall keep a journal.

I understand that the ruling of the Chair now is that the constitutional power of the Senate to adopt its rules is not confined to the beginning of the session, but may apply at any time during the session. Is not that the ruling of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So it is not essential that all of the responsibility of this body be laid aside for an interminable period, merely to exercise the power to change the rules at the beginning of the session. There is no constitutional mandate to that effect, is there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would agree with the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, with this exception: The key problem around which this discussion has revolved is with regard to the question of whether the Senate can move to bring a question of change of the rules to a vote, as the Senator from Wyoming is aware. It is the opinion of the Chair that insofar as that problem is concerned, at the beginning of a new Congress the Senate can proceed to adopt new rules or to amend old rules without being inhibited by any previous rule which might restrict or deny the constitutional right or power of a majority of the membership of the Senate to determine its rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I call to the attention of the Presiding Officer the fact that the leadership on both sides of the aisle have offered a resolution to modify and amend an existing rule by liberalizing it, namely by making it more difficult to conduct a filibuster, by enabling two-thirds of those present and voting to apply cloture, instead of requiring the vote of two-thirds of the constitutional membership of the body.

In the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas, on behalf of the leadership, there is not before the Senate now, is there, anything which falls within the category just now mentioned by the Presiding Officer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair should point out that that question will arise when the Senate reaches the point where it desires to work its will by coming to a vote on the question of the liberalization of the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to a resolution (H. Res. 5) providing that a committee of three Members be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join with a committee on the part of the Senate to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House had been assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication that he may be pleased to make.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, January 9, 1959, at 12:30 o'clock in the afternoon, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. Herman P. Eberharter, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. Sid Simpson, late a Representative from the State of Illinois, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The message further communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. J. Harry McGregor, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 12 o'clock has arrived. The morning hour is now terminated; and, under the precedents, Resolution No. 5, submitted by the Senator from Texas, will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to yield to me, so that at this time I may make a motion.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the distinguished majority leader, provided I may do so without losing the floor. After yielding to the majority leader, I desire to continue to yield to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to make a very brief statement: When a similar Anderson motion was before this body in 1953, there was debate on it for 3 hours and 50-odd minutes. If the motion I am about to make is agreed to by the Senate, it is my understanding that the Senate will have before it at that time, under the previous unanimous-consent request, the present Anderson motion. Is that correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution No. 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas. [Putting the question.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to notify the attachés on both sides of the aisle and the leadership of the Senate minority that we are hopeful that the Senate may be able to obtain a vote on a motion which I plan to make after Senators who wish to speak on the Anderson motion have done so—namely, a motion to table that motion. I expect to make my motion with the concurrence of the minority leader, at some time agreeable to him, either late this afternoon or perhaps early in the evening, if that course seems to be acceptable to a goodly number of our colleagues.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly we would not have any objection to such an arrangement. However, I point out that there are so many visitors to the Capitol, from all over the country, and so many functions have been arranged, that certainly it would be embarrassing to a great many Members of the Senate and to others if the session today were to continue to an unseemly hour, so that they could not attend these meetings. Therefore, I believe we should have a reasonable understanding as to what will transpire this evening, so that Senators may be able to attend meetings which have been arranged for a considerable period of time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I assure the Senator from Illinois that I shall consider that situation. However, I hope we shall be able to obtain a vote before the holding of the various meetings, because this question is a very important one, and we should reach a decision on rule XXII. The Senate has heard the discussion of this theory for several Congresses. I believe that most Senators who wish to speak on this question are prepared to speak, and I am informed that they are prepared to speak at not too great length. So, if possible, I should like to give them an opportunity to speak before I make such a motion, perhaps late in the evening, but not at such an hour as to inconvenience any Senator who has important responsibilities elsewhere.

Mr. President, I shall talk to the various proponents of this measure, because all of us understand that a motion to lay on the table is not debatable. But it should be understood that we do not expect to make such a motion until Members have had an adequate opportunity to express their views.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may continue to yield to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], if he wishes me to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I was addressing an inquiry to the Presiding Officer, with respect to his ruling, after I had read to the Presiding Officer pertinent provisions of the Constitution. Now calling his attention to the text of Senate Resolution 5, which was submitted to this body by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], on behalf of himself, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], I know that the Presiding Officer is well aware of the contents of the resolution—namely, that it deals with a modification, a liberalization of subsection 2 of rule XXII, by striking out this language from the existing rule: "except subsection 3 of rule XXII."

That is the language which, in the present rule, adopted in 1949, makes it impossible to suppress a filibuster against an amendment to a rule. The resolution also strikes out the words "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn." They are the words in the existing rule XXII which require a constitutional two-thirds majority, that is to say, two-thirds of all the Senators duly chosen and qualified. The resolution would insert in lieu thereof the words "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting."

So that all this resolution does is provide a restraint upon the present rule under which filibusters are conducted.

Section 2 of the resolution also provides for striking out these words from subsection 3 of the present rule XXII: "and of subsection (2) of this rule."

So that there is no provision, under the resolution now before the Senate, which, in any way, shape, or effect, strengthens or makes more rigid the present rule permitting filibusters. Indeed, it ameliorates that rule.

So I ask the Presiding Officer, as a parliamentary inquiry, Is there anything in the pending Senate Resolution 5 that involves a constitutional question by which the resolution would deprive a majority of any right to make the rules of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's parliamentary inquiry relates to what would be the situation with regard to amending rules in the event Senate Resolution 5 were adopted. What the Chair has constantly referred to is not that situation, but the situation under which Senate Resolution 5 would have to be considered, which means the rules of the Senate currently existing, which the Senator has very properly, in the opinion of the Chair, said permit an unlimited filibuster. That is why the Chair has indicated his opinion that in the consideration of either Senate Resolution 5, if the Senate decides to proceed along that line, or in the consideration of the Anderson substitute, if the Senate decides to proceed along that line, the provisions of Senate rule XII to the effect that unlimited debate on a change in the rules is permitted is not binding.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does it not also follow that if Senate Resolution 5 were adopted, there would be no possibility of unlimited filibuster under the present rules, to which the Chair has just referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Senator from Wyoming of course, is not only an authority on constitutional law, but an authority on the rules of the Senate, as the Chair is well aware, the Senator will recognize that is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator is asking the Chair to express an opinion on a resolution which may be acted upon by the Senate. The Chair feels that is a subject inappropriate to be commented on by the Chair.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There have been several efforts during the day to determine what the Presiding Officer had in mind when he referred to the possibility that a constitutional question would be before the Senate. What I am trying to address to the Chair is what I conceive to be a parliamentary inquiry, so that all Members of the Senate may know what the Vice President has in mind that would comprise a constitutional question, if the resolution were acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer that question as he previously has done. A constitutional question would be presented if the time should come during the course of the debate when action on changing the rules should seem unlikely because of extended debate. At that point any Member of the Senate, in the opinion of the Chair, would have the right to move to cut off debate. Such a motion would be questioned by raising a point of order. At that point the Chair would submit the question to the Senate on the ground that a constitutional question had been raised because of the Chair's opinion that the Senate, at the commencement of a new Congress, has the power to make its rules. That power, in the Chair's opinion, cannot be restricted even by action of the Senate itself, which would be the case where the memship of the Senate in one Congress has attempted to curtail the constitutional right of the membership of the Senate in another Congress to adopt its rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That the Senate itself cannot restrict that power? Did not the Presiding Officer, only a few moments ago, rule that a majority may change the rules, and that it may be done at any time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming is referring to another and an entirely different subject. Whenever a vote on the merits of the question of a change in the rules is taken by the Senate, the question, of course, is decided by majority vote; but when we are concerned as we are here with getting to a vote on the merits—in other words, cutting off debate—as the Senator is well aware, majority rule does not apply under the present rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Presiding Officer, then, is basing his answer to my inquiry, not upon the assumption on which I presented it—namely, on the question now before the Senate—but on something that may possibly happen, and that may never come to pass?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming, as well as other Senators, have been propounding hypothetical questions of this type throughout the course of proceedings in the past 2 days, and the Chair, as he believes, consistent with his responsibilities as Presiding Officer, has been attempting to indicate what he believes the parliamentary situation will be, so that Members of the Senate may be guided by an indication of what action will be taken.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I may say to the Presiding Officer I recognize that fact, and I applaud the diligence with which the Presiding Officer has attempted to answer hypothetical questions. I point out to him, however, that my question is not a hypothetical question; it is based on the facts which are before the Senate. I am trying to determine if it is not the opinion of the Chair, in the present realistic situation, that no constitutional question is raised by the resolution of the Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will reiterate what he has said previously, that it would be inappropriate for the Chair to indicate his opinion as to the merits of the resolution of the Senator from Texas. That is the question which the Senator from Wyoming has put.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Vice President has misunderstood the Senator from Wyoming. I do not ask for his decision on the merits of the question; I ask for his ruling on a parliamentary problem—whether or not, in his opinion, there is a constitutional question involved in Senate Resolution 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understood the Senator from Wyoming earlier, he read Senate Resolution 5 and pointed out the language which provides for cutting off debate by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. The Senator then propounded a parliamentary inquiry as to whether the provision was one which the Chair would consider to be unconstitutional. The Chair replied then, as the Chair does now, that it would be inappropriate for the Chair to comment on the merits of a resolution which may be before the Senate. If the Senator's question relates to that proposition, the Chair will have to persist in the statement he previously made.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a question on that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that the time belongs to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

I will yield the floor by asking unanimous consent that the full text of Senate Resolution 5 be printed in the RECORD at this point so that it may be a part of the RECORD for those who read this colloquy.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out "except subsection 3 of rule XXII,", and (2) by striking out "two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn" and inserting in lieu thereof "two-thirds of the Senators present and voting."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "and of subsection 2 of this rule."

SEC. 3. Rule XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by inserting "1." immediately preceding "At", and by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"2. The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should also like to point out that the resolution does not in any way whatsoever deal with legislation. It deals only with the power of cloture, not with the right of the majority of the Senate to make its rules. It provides that cloture could no longer be applied only by a two-thirds vote of all duly qualified Senators but by two-thirds of those present and voting. The present rule exempting from cloture any motion to amend the rules, thus permitting unlimited filibuster will also be killed by the resolution. Therefore, this is a liberal movement toward ending filibusters.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to one other colleague without losing my right to the floor. Then I should like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for about 15 minutes, to complete my remarks.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If I may be recognized under the permission given to the Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. President, apropos of the query propounded by the Senator from Wyoming I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

My understanding is that the Chair has consistently ruled, both 2 years ago and this year, that the Senate has a constitutional right to determine its rules at the beginning of a new Congress. My question is, would action upon Senate Resolution 5, the Johnson resolution, liquidate such rights; that is, if Senate Resolution 5 were acted upon, either agreed to or rejected, would the Presiding Officer hold that it constituted an exercise of a constitutional right to consider revision of the rules?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair that would be the case. The right to which the Chair has referred, and the right which the Chair believes cannot be restricted by rules of the Senate adopted in a previous Congress, is a constitutional right which exists at the beginning of a new Congress. That right will no longer exist once the Senate has proceeded to the consideration of substantive matters and by acquiescence—as it has over the past 160 years—has indicated its approval of the previous rules of the Senate; or, as in this instance, once the Senate acts on a rules proposal. The Chair believes either the Johnson proposal or the Anderson proposal would be in that category.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is the Presiding Officer saying——

The VICE PRESIDENT. In other words, once the Senate has the opportunity to consider the matter of rules at the beginning of a Congress and proceeds to other business, after either approving a proposal which is before it, or proceeding to lay that proposal on the table, the opinion of the Chair is that the constitutional right to which the Chair has referred is one which at that point no longer exists. But the Chair should point out that there always exists in the Senate, of course, the right to proceed to change the rules at any time during the course of the session under the rules which the Senate itself, either by acquiescence or action, has adopted.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota respectfully points out that Senate Resolution 5 deals with only two rules; in fact, with only portions of two rules. If the consideration of the resolution were to liquidate the constitutional right of the Senate, the part would be equal to the whole, unless the Chair would also hold that any amendment to the Johnson resolution would be in order if it dealt with rules. Otherwise, the Chair would be holding we could only exercise a constitutional right with respect to one clause in the rules that we had liquidated our right to consider the rules as a whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair should point out to the Senator from South Dakota that the Senate at the initiation of this session has the opportunity to consider either the Johnson resolution or the Anderson motion. The Senate by its decision on the matter which will be taken up later today, through a motion to lay on the table, will, in the opinion of the Chair, have the opportunity to work its will with respect to the whole body of rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in that connection, if the Senator will yield to me, I should like to add that it is not necessary to obtain unanimous consent as to the hour to vote on this matter, but I remind Senators again that a motion to table is in order. We do not want to take any Senator by surprise. We want all Senators to be informed that unless developments to the contrary justify our cancelling such action, we anticipate making a motion to table sometime in the latter part of the afternoon.

After consultation with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], the Senator from Texas will make such a motion.

I have just talked with the Senator from New Mexico; and he anticipates no long discussion.

I do not care to ask for a unanimous consent agreement, because we plan to make a motion to table, and such an agreement is not necessary. However, I warn all Members that perhaps a motion to table will be made, if it is agreeable to the Senators with whom I have talked, sometime between 4 and 6 o'clock. I would not want them to be inaccessible during that period.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator say between 4 and 6 o'clock?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Between 4 and 6 o'clock today. It depends on the time the proponents want to use in support of the proposition.

Has the Senator from Oklahoma about concluded his address? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator from Oklahoma has concluded the first paragraph of his address. The Senator from Oklahoma has held the floor for approximately one and a half hours and has proceeded through one paragraph. As a result of the colloquies and interrogations on parliamentary procedure, I have educated, illuminated and instructed the Senate more in this subject by my silence than I have ever achieved in an hour and a half speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I agree with the Senator, and I thank him for his patience and understanding. I think he has served a very good purpose. I hope the Senator will be able to complete his address some time during the day.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like briefly to go through the material I have prepared, and should be happy to yield at the conclusion for any questions. I think the distinguished Senator from South Dakota has completed his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from South Dakota for yielding to me. I am sorry it was necessary to interject, but I thought I should serve notice on the Senate that the motion to table will be made.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I should like to conclude by observing that the Presiding Officer's ruling would apparently say to those who must vote on this matter this afternoon that if we want to amend any other part of the rules we must vote against the motion to table the Anderson resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly the Chair has not made any such ruling as that.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota understood the Chair to say that if the Senate were to table the Anderson motion and act upon the Johnson resolution, it would have liquidated the constitutional right which the Chair has said exists, to consider the determination of our rules as a whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that the Senator from South Dakota is perhaps discussing a different question from that to which the Chair referred. The Chair indicated that the constitutional right, in the opinion of the Chair, is one which accrues to the membership of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress. It must be exercised at the beginning of a new Congress, and can be exercised without regard to any inhibiting rules restricting that right adopted in a previous Congress.

The Chair should point out, however, that at any time during the course of the Congress the Senate may move to amend its rules, but during the course of the Congress, the Senate would be bound by whatever rules it adopted at the beginning of a Congress.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota does not misunderstand the position of the Chair in that respect at all. However, the Chair has said that if the Senate were to table the Anderson motion and then consider the Johnson resolution, it would have liquidated the constitutional right to consider the whole body of rules at this time. Is not that correct?

Let me add this observation to clarify the point: The Senator from South Dakota happens to believe that a rule of germaneness is even more important than the question of cloture, and the Senator from South Dakota would like an opportunity to present at this time, while the Senate is considering its right to adopt rules, an amendment to the rules dealing with the question of germaneness. The Senator from South Dakota does not wish to be foreclosed with respect to that right. Under the ruling of the Chair, as I understand, I shall have to vote against tabling the Anderson motion if I wish to have considered at this time my proposal of a rule of germaneness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the conclusion of the consideration of the Johnson resolution, Senate Resolution 5, the Senator from South Dakota could, through the usual procedures, move to take up his proposal relating to the rule of germaneness.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Would the Chair then hold that if the Senator from South Dakota were to offer a separate resolution dealing with the rule of germaneness, he would be entitled to have the proposal considered at this time, without reference to committee, in the same manner in which the Johnson resolution is being considered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota would have to proceed under rule XL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a clarifying statement?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I shall yield the floor back to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who yielded to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

I now yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I desire to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for November 8, 1954. The report of the select committee to study censure charges in the case involving the late Senator McCarthy, of Wisconsin, submitted its report on November 8, 1954. The committee consisted of the then Senator from Utah, Mr. Watkins, the then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Johnson, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. The report contains the following language——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Senator from South Dakota is familiar with that language.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If I may, I should like to complete my statement, and then I will yield to the Senator.

I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for November 8, 1954:

> The fact that the Senate is a continuing body should require little discussion. This has been uniformly recognized by history, precedent, and authority. While the rule with reference to the House, whose Members are elected all for the period of a single Congress may be different, the Senate is a continuing body, whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years, and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress. Senate Document No. 99, 83d Congress, 2d session, Congressional Power of Investigation, page 7.

As I understand the inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota, he says that if the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] to table the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] should prevail, the Senate would then be precluded from amending its rules during the remainder of the session.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I wish to make it abundantly clear that we now have at the desk a proposed amendment to rule XXII. We would change rule XXII in two respects. We would make an addition to rule XXXII. When and if we reach a vote on that question, the Senator from Texas is prepared to make a suggestion to rewrite rule XXV completely.

At every session of the Congress the rules are amended. They are amended with respect to the constitution of our committees, and the ratio of majority and minority members. That is usually done by unanimous consent. But I point out again for the RECORD that the majority of the Members of the Senate can rewrite the rules, each one of them, all 40 of them. Substitutes may be submitted for each of the 40 rules. The Senate can amend them in any respect it may desire, at any time a majority of the Senate shall so decide. I say "majority," because I was shocked to hear two very able Members say they thought any amendment to the rules required a two-thirds vote.

Our distinguished forefathers did provide a requirement for a two-thirds vote to expel a Senator. They provided for a two-thirds vote to impeach a President. They provided for a two-thirds vote in other instances. But the Senate of the United States, by majority vote, can amend any of its rules or rewrite all its rules.

I assure the Senate that instead of allowing this debate to go on and on and on, as to whether we should adopt all the rules at one time, or one at a time, or amend them, operating for days without any rules at all, operating under Robert's Rules of Order, or general parliamentary practice, as some Senators say—and I do not know who would determine what general parliamentary practice is—if the motion to table should prevail, we could then obtain an immediate vote on the question of majority rule, in the form of the Humphrey-Douglas-Javits proposal.

If the majority of the Senate should not agree to go along with that proposal, we could obtain a vote on the proposal for a three-fifths vote, if any Senator should care to offer it. If a majority of the Senate should not care to go along with that proposal, we could obtain a vote on Senate Resolution 5, proposed by the leadership on both sides.

In any event, it is the intention of the leadership to remain here early and late, as long as may be necessary, in an attempt to amend rule XXII in two respects; and to amend rule XXXII in another respect. The Senate cannot function unless there is an amendment to rule XXV, because after the election the percentages in the Senate changed considerably, and the ratio of the parties on committees will be changed substantially.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to address a question to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to the Senator from Texas that I understand perfectly the statement he has just made, and I agree entirely with it. We cannot proceed day by day, changing the rules one by one, if we so desire, by majority vote, and no Senator, new or old, is denied the right to suggest any changes of any rule he desires.

However, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] understood the answer of the Vice President just as I understood it. The Vice President, in attempting to answer my parliamentary inquiry, stated that if the resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas, on behalf of both the majority and minority leaderships should prevail, the Senate would not thereafter have the constitutional right to change its rules. In other words, the Vice President is telling us that the Senate of the United States, by majority vote, may amend the Constitution—a perfect absurdity.

When he attempted to answer my inquiry as to where in the Constitution there is any line to indicate that a failure of the Senate to adopt all its rules at the beginning of a session would cut off the right of the Senate to act, he could not answer. He raised then the hypothetical situation of what might happen if rule XXII of the present Standing Rules of the Senate were to be invoked on a filibuster. I have been trying to point out that the Senator from Texas is endeavoring to liberalize the rule, to strike out the exemption from cloture which is granted by the present rule, the so-called Wherry rule, when dealing with motions to change the rules.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas is attempting to do something else also.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He is attempting also to say that the rules will continue from one session to another. We know that is the case now, but we have found some very unusual and unique positions being taken by certain Members of the Senate. When it serves the purpose to censure a Senator, the Senate is a continuing body and then our rules do carry over. On such occasion we must act under those rules, we adopt committee reports and we take action.

However, when it comes to another matter, and the heat is on from another direction, we say, "We do not have any rules now. Let us not have any rules. We will proceed under Robert's Rules of Order, if we can borrow a copy of them at the city library." [Laughter.]

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In answer to my parliamentary inquiry, the Vice President said that the rules of the previous Congress could not be invoked to prevent a change of a rule by majority vote. But in the next breath he said that this Congress may deny it the right to change the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that to be the position of the Vice President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It cannot possibly be the parliamentary rule. It cannot possibly be the constitutional rule. It cannot possibly be the logical rule. I ask the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] whether he was not one of the leading Members in the group of Senators who worked upon the reorganization bill?

Mr. MONRONEY. I had the distinction of being vice chairman of that group, in conjunction with the great Senator from Wisconsin, the late Bob La Follette.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And the Senator brought before the Senate a bill which changed the rules, did he not?

Mr. MONRONEY. The most extensive changes in the Senate rules in our history were made by the Legislative Reorganization Act. More than half of the then standing committees were consolidated into those in our present committee structure. Jurisdictions were clearly defined. This committee structure is contained in rule XXV, which the Anderson amendment would nullify, and would require that it be considered de novo at each session.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma when the Legislative Reorganization Act was passed?

Mr. MONRONEY. In the summer of 1946.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Was it at the beginning of a session?

Mr. MONRONEY. It was not at the beginning of the session.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Did anyone suggest when the Senator was working on that bill that he had lost his constitutional right to amend the rules because he did not do it at the beginning of the session?

Mr. MONRONEY. It would be perfectly ridiculous for anyone to assume the Senate ever loses its right to change its rules. We have rules which make it possible for a majority to work its will in connection with the rules of the Senate on any day of the year. It is not necessary to have the proposals go to the Committee on Rules and Administration. It is our practice to refer such a proposal to the committee, but the rule merely provides that such a resolution may be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does not the Senator agree that there is no paragraph, no section, no article, and no clause in the Constitution which denies to the Senate the right to change its rules whenever it wishes to do so?

Mr. MONRONEY. Rather, the provisions of the Constitution, in effect since 1789, necessarily permit the Senate to change its rules whenever the Senate wishes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The ruling we have heard here today, that the Senate would be constitutionally prohibited from changing its rules if it did not do so at the beginning of a session, is not upheld by any single law, constitutional or statutory?

Mr. MONRONEY. I know of no authority that has ever raised a shadow of doubt in that regard.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I now yield to the Senator from Oregon for a question.

Mr. MORSE. I am so anxious to hear the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma that I shall not at this time answer the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Texas in regard to their interpretation of the Vice President's ruling. I shall speak in my own time later. I believe the Senators have completely misinterpreted the ruling of the Vice President, as I shall show later. Therefore, I shall listen to the Senator from Oklahoma at this time and discuss this matter in my own right when I get the floor later, and I shall do so at some length.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am deeply flattered by the statement of my distinguished colleague. I trust that I shall be able to complete my remarks within 20 or 30 minutes.

Mr. President, in all seriousness, the colloquies and parliamentary inquiries which have been going on during the 2 hours I have held the floor have contributed greatly to the education and enlightenment of the Senate in connection with this complex problem of rules and the adoption of rules. It has been highly instructive to the Senate. All Senators have benefited by the inquiries addressed to the Chair. They have had the advantage of the expressions by authorities such as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and many other Senators, on the interpretation of the rules.

However, it seems to me that the important thing—and it speaks more eloquently than anything I could ever say on the subject—is that the enlightenment of the Senate which has resulted was based on the little black book I hold in my hand. It is called the Senate Manual. It contains the 40 rules which have come down to us after surviving many periods of change. All the answers which have been given are in the rule book. We are able to proceed today to change the rules in an orderly way, as proposed by the Johnson amendment to change rule XXII, only because we have these rules in the first place.

If the Anderson proposal were to supplant the Johnson proposal, we would have no rules under which to proceed. We would proceed de novo. There would be no limitation on debate, and any Senator who had the floor could hold it. I say that because there would be no rules. There would be no rule that a Senator must proceed in order, or that he must refrain from making derogatory references to his colleagues in the Senate. We would be flying blind, without instruments and without any control points to check. Under the Anderson proposal we would throw out the rule book and say that the Senate rules are not continuing.

The proposal of the Senator from New Mexico sets forth that—

> In accordance with article I, section 5 of the Constitution, which declares that * * * "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings" * * * I now move that this body take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

That motion provides for the taking up for immediate consideration the question of the adoption of rules. It does not say "a rule" or "an amendment to rule XXII." It is proposed to take up the rule book, and there would be no rule which would apply. The Anderson proposal would take us into a blind area.

Our problem is not a theoretical one, as to whether the Senate is a continuing body or a noncontinuing body. Our problem is whether the precedent of continuing the rules of the Senate from one Congress to another, unless they are changed in accordance with the rules, is in the public interest. That is what the Senate must consider.

Stated in another way, our problem is whether it is in the public interest to establish the precedent. Let me emphasize the word "precedent" that the Senate shall adopt new rules without prior committee study, at the beginning of each new Congress. I submit that to establish such a precedent would be a great disservice to the Senate, to the American people, and perhaps to the world.

I am not afraid of this Congress. I am not afraid of the Members of the Senate. I know the Senators who are proposing that the rules be changed. I know the Senators who are sponsors of the Anderson proposal. They are sincere in their endeavor.

I favor changing rule XXII according to the Johnson proposal. I am not in favor of establishing a precedent of adopting brand new rules every 2 years which would haunt the Senate in years to come. I know not what the vicissitudes of political life will bring into the Senate. I do not look with favor upon the possibility of wrecking Senate rules which have been passed down to us since 1790.

As the majority leader has asked, Will the Senate operate under Robert's Rules of Order? Under those rules, a two-thirds vote is required to move the previous question. So those who say the Senate rules are restrictive will not find Robert's Rules of Order to be less so.

Therefore, it seems to me that we would be foolish in the extreme to adopt the Anderson motion, not because of the fight over rule XXII, not because of the Senators we know and respect who wish to make these changes, but because we cannot see, in the future of this great Nation, what the position of a future Senate may be and what purpose would be served by this precedent in the future.

We should not lose sight of the fact—and I assure the Senate that it is a fact—that the most tempting permanent target of rules change is the Senate's committee structure. The demand has been, and will always be, for more and more committees. Not only personal ambition, but more frequently deep personal interest in particular fields, will continually generate demands for new committees.

The present committee structure of both the House and Senate is the result of 2 years of study and hearings by the joint committee on legislative reorganization, which culminated in the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1947.

When that committee began its work the multiplication of committees had over the years reached the point of absolute absurdity. The Senate boasted more than 30 standing committees, with many Senators serving on 7 or 8. Their development represented a little known variant of Parkisons Law—year after year there were more and more committees accomplishing less and less. There was constant confusion and bickering over jurisdiction. No Senator could possibly keep up with the business of more than a few of the committees on which he served.

To create a tempting opportunity to create pet committees at the beginning of each Congress would all but insure that we would begin a return to that same sorry mess.

There will of course be need for change in the present committee system to meet new problems as they arise. An excellent illustration of this occurred in the last Congress with the creation of the Committee on Aeronautics and Space Sciences. But if such need is genuine it can withstand the careful study by the Committee on Rules, with a full hearing on the pros and cons.

I know that there are those who contend that because the House adopts its rules at the beginning of each Congress, the Senate can do the same. I can only say, on the basis of service in both bodies, that they are not the same, and that procedures which work well in one would not work in the other. I would also remind the Senate that even in the House, the practice has already resulted in the creation of a new standing committee before most members knew what was happening.

Today, all appropriation bills must be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. What might happen in the future, if some dissatisfied Senators, who had been disappointed with the careful consideration given to a matter by the Committee on Appropriations, got together with members of legislative committees, such as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Committee on Foreign Relations, or the Committee on Public Works, and attempted to change rule XXV so as to strip the Committee on Appropriations of its right to recommend appropriations, and there should be a return to the practice which was once followed in the last century, when legislative committees recommended their own appropriations?

The present Senate rules have been carefully designed to give definite jurisdiction to each committee. The number of committees has been reduced by more than half. Senators no longer serve on 7 or 8 committees; their service has been reduced to 2 or 3 committees, so as to enable them to concentrate more effectively on their work. Committees have been provided with staff experts, so as to afford Congress the best information and know-how, instead of having to take legislation spoon-fed from the executive departments.

I observed the work of Bob La Follette during the 2 years I worked with him on the revision of the rules. He knew the rules could be changed. But he knew there was a right way to do it, and that was to bring about an orderly change through orderly consideration and orderly discussion. He did not act in haste. I fear that under the Anderson motion the Senate would be rushing to do something which would haunt us down through the years.

The debate has better informed Senators and should demonstrate the wisdom of the Democratic leadership, speaking through the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], in offering a specific amendment to rule XXII. The colloquies and parliamentary inquiries have shown how rule XXII, which is at issue here, can be amended. It can be amended so as to provide that two-thirds of the Senators present and voting may invoke cloture. It can be amended so as to provide that one-half the Members present and voting may invoke cloture. It can be amended, if a majority of the Senate wishes to do so, so as to provide that 10 percent of the membership may invoke cloture. We have that right, and the majority can work its will through the resolution before us.

In this moment of reflection, when we are asked to reverse a precedent of 170 years and to vote that the Senate has no rules—because that is what we shall do if we adopt the Anderson motion—we should consider whether we should not instead only amend rule XXII. I have heard no argument made that most of the present rules are not good rules. The objection is to rule XXII. I should like to propose and have adopted a rule of germaneness. But I would rather present that proposal to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I should like to have such a proposal considered in the quiet of a committee room and then have it brought before the Senate for discussion and consideration.

The adoption of an entirely new set of rules could destroy the individual rights and prerogatives of Senators. In a few words, it could strip away the jurisdiction of the Committee on Finance to write tax laws. It could transfer the jurisdiction of that committee to, perhaps, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Any jurisdiction could be shifted around by the changing of a few words. Certainly that could be the jugular vein which some future Senate might hit.

We are asked, by the Anderson motion, to throw overboard the precedents which have been carefully developed since 1790, and to say that on the opening day of a Congress we shall rewrite the entire book of rules and make them subject to adoption. Thus any group of Senators having a strong majority behind them could write rules which could gag the minority.

I like our rules. I think our rules generally are good, because they not only protect the right of a majority to work its will, but they protect the right of the minority to be heard and to be dealt with fairly and with justice. If the rules do not give the majority the proper balance, or if the minority is too powerful, then the Senate can change the rules.

I would add a rule of germaneness requiring that debate must be germane to the pending business of the Senate; a rule which would give further power to the majority to work its will, but still leave the minority in this great Chamber opportunity to be heard.

Throughout history there have been moments in the Senate when great men who walked this floor, sometimes only a handful, seemed to be a voice in the wilderness, men who had the courage to stand up and advocate principles which led to great reforms, sometimes a score of years later. Many of those men are included in the great hall of fame of the Senate. These rules let them speak.

The British common law was not a written document at first; it was a product of tradition. This is what we have in our own rules. We have rules which are mellowed with the patina of age. The Senate as a legislative body should be able to assert its will; and under orderly processes, we can work our will, understanding and knowing what we can do.

I feel that the Anderson proposal, particularly with respect to our committee system, will open up in some future Congress, a bargain day for the crackpots to tear up the rule book and adopt 40 new rules. No one can know what the final result of that will be in practice.

On the other hand, if we can change laws by majority vote, we can change the rules of the Senate by majority vote. We do not at each session, de novo, enact a brand new code of laws; we merely change the laws which need to be changed. By the same token, the rules, which are the cornerstone of our lawmaking operations must be changed in similar fashion.

Senators should not think it will not be used if today the Senate establishes this precedent that the Senate is a de novo, new body every 2 years. During the year-long hearings before Senator La Follette, there was not one word of testimony which would show that there was ever a belief that the Senate was a non-continuing body; and those hearings were attended by all the great governmental authorities, including Members of the Senate. At that time no one questioned that the Senate was a continuing body; the continuing nature of the Senate was a great tradition of history, like the British common law which by usage and acceptance became even more firm than legislation or written law itself.

So I plead with the Members of the Senate, regardless of what their position about rule XXII may be, to remember that the rules of the Senate provide for orderly procedure, which can be changed today, tomorrow, or at any other time, but which should be changed only in the case of individual points regarding which changes or corrections may be needed, rather than to throw away the entire book of rules. Certainly that is the position all Senators should take.

Therefore, I plead with all Senators to support the resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. I plead with all Senators to stay with the rock of ages. I plead with them to vote to change the rules in any way they need to be changed, but not to vote to throw away the entire rule book and open the way for a bargain day for crackpots in some future Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CASE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to my distinguished colleague.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Oklahoma has delivered a speech which should attract the attention of every Member of this body and also the attention of all other students of government, many of whom have been expressing opinions in regard to the question today before the Senate.

The able Senator from Oklahoma has urged caution in changing the rules of the Senate. He has demonstrated his own desire to be cautious in approaching the subject, by saying that although he believes that a rule of germaneness should be applied with respect to the procedure in connection with rule XXII, yet he is not certain—as I understand him—whether he will offer that proposal as an amendment to the pending measure or whether he will submit it as an individual suggestion or resolution to be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

His suggestion of the application of a rule of germaneness if a point of order regarding germaneness is made, strikes me as having great merit; and I hope he will consider offering his proposal as an amendment to the Johnson resolution, or that at least, he will give further consideration to the possibility of doing so.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I deeply appreciate what my friend of 20 years in the Congress, the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee, has said.

My belief is that it would be wise for the Senate to have the right to require that debate be germane, so that pending questions could be disposed of at certain points during the procedure. But I believe careful study is necessary in regard to the rule-making function. Unless the adoption of a rule of germaneness were needed in order to form a bridge which would help solve the problem in regard to rule XXII, which all of us understand, I would prefer to wait, and to present my ideas to the Committee on Rules and Administration, because I believe it proper that great care be used in connection with all rule changes.

All Senators are familiar with rule XXII. It has been before the Senate for a long time.

I am reluctant to ask the Senate to go along with my idea until it has been carefully studied, unless its adoption would bring the two sides closer together in finding a better way to dispose of the difficulties and problems regarding rule XXII.

Therefore, I intend at this time to withhold my suggestion or resolution in regard to a rule of germaneness; but I intend to go before the Committee on Rules and Administration and to urge that committee to bring my proposal before the Senate under the regular procedure, so firmly do I believe in the exercise of care in regard to the rules under which this great body operates.

Mr. GORE. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. I should like to point out that a rule of germaneness would give, not only to the majority of the Senate, but also to any Member or Members of the Senate, a weapon by which they could hold the debate to the subject under consideration, if such a rule of germaneness were to be invoked.

Of course there are many rules of the Senate which customarily are not invoked. For instance, both the junior Senator from Oklahoma and the junior Senator from Tennessee are now violating certain rules of the Senate which the junior Senator from Michigan could invoke if he now desired to do so, inasmuch as the junior Senator from Tennessee is speaking away from his desk, and the junior Senator from Oklahoma is resting his arm on his desk. If the Senator from Michigan were to object, then, under the rules of the Senate, the Presiding Officer would call us to order.

The junior Senator from Oklahoma has now suggested another means by which a Senator who might be engaged or who was thought to be engaged in dilatory debate for the purpose of preventing the taking of action could be held to debate on the subject under consideration. I think that proposal has merit.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, under my proposal a majority of the Senate would have to vote on a motion to require germaneness; but such a requirement still would permit freedom of debate in the normal processes of business. However, following the adoption of such a rule by the Senate, Senators would have a right, at a point which to them seemed wise, to invoke the rule of germaneness regarding further debate on the business then before the Senate. I believe that would be a good idea. However, again I say that I wish to be most cautious and to exercise great care in regard to the rulemaking process. Nevertheless, if a compromise is to be made—and of course all of us realize that compromises are necessary in connection with the making of the rules—perhaps my idea should be considered. I appreciate the comment made by my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Tennessee, who has had so much experience and is so wise regarding this field.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; or I am prepared to yield the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish to commend the Senator from Oklahoma for the fine statement he has made; and then I wish to make some comments in my own behalf.

Mr. MONRONEY. Very well; I am glad to yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. President, I wish to join the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] in commending our distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], for his very clear, lucid, emphatic statement in regard to a very fundamental principle, namely, that the Senate is a continuing body. That was intended by the framers of the Constitution. It was so considered by the first Members of the Senate, who were closest to the time of the drafting and ratification of the Constitution. The vote which will be taken this afternoon will be a direct vote on the question whether the Senate shall break the thus-far-unbroken precedent—unbroken since the Senate was first established.

My distinguished friend did not discuss in detail two points, namely, that in providing that two-thirds of the Senate always would hold over, and in providing that the President would send nominations to the Senate while it was in recess—not to a new Senate, but to the same, continuing Senate—the framers of the Constitution intended that the Senate should be a continuing body. That was so stated at that time in the Federalist papers, by Madison, Hamilton, and Jay. In two United States Supreme Court decisions which have dealt with the functioning of Senate committees during a recess of the Senate—and of course the committees of the Senate would not be able to function and would not exist during a recess of the Senate if the Senate itself were not then continuing and alive—the Supreme Court has held that the Senate is a continuing body, and that its committees function while the Senate is in recess, although that does not apply to the House of Representatives. I cannot emphasize too strongly the point which has been so well brought out by the Senator from Oklahoma, that if we take the position that the Senate has no rules when it meets for a new session, there will be an opening for any proposal of a temporary majority, whereas undoubtedly in our early history the new Union of sovereign States, with equal rights in this body, would not have come about unless there had been the great compromise. The keystone of that arch is the right to protect the sovereignty of our several States, and the assurance that the Senate, as a continuing body, would have rules definitely established for the protection of the minority. That theory is not inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution that the Senate can change its own rules whenever it wants to. There is no question about that. But the Senator from Oklahoma is exactly right in his statement that by tradition, by precedent, by the clear meaning of the Constitution, by two Supreme Court decisions, the Senate is a continuing body, and we should never change that fundamental principle of our unique form of government.

I appreciate the kindness of the Senator from Oklahoma in yielding to me. With his permission, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of his remarks there may be printed in the RECORD an extended discussion I had prepared on the subject of the Senate's being a continuing body. It has been so universally accepted that the Senate is a continuing body that the speech of the Senator from Oklahoma is the first extended speech that has been made in this body on the question since 1915, when one was made by Senator Elihu Root, of New York. Not in the past 35 or 40 years has there been a speech dealing specifically with the point made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The junior Senator from Virginia felt this would be the time and place for us to put into the RECORD not only evidence as to where we stand on this question, but to get all the authorities about the question into the record, so we would not be plagued every 2 years with the recurrent assertion that "the Senate is not a continuing body; let us throw out the rulebook and start afresh."

Mr. MONRONEY. I am grateful to my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Virginia. I appreciate his remarks and his very able statement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the statement to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBERTSON

THE SENATE AS A CONTINUING BODY

Evidence that the Senate was intended to be a continuing body and has so functioned throughout its history is so overwhelming I am frankly surprised that we find it necessary to argue the point at this time.

It is true that in January 1957, the Vice President, offered an informal opinion that Senate continuity is of limited application and that the Senate was not bound to respect a standing rule permitting unlimited debate on proposals to change the rules. The Senate chose not to take up that isolated challenge and I had hoped we would continue to accept the theory of former President Buchanan who said the Senate had existed as a permanent body since the day of its meeting in 1789 and would continue to so exist as long as the Government should endure.

The question has been raised again this year, however, and the Vice President has said that while the rules which governed the Senate at its previous session are in effect when we convene, the Senate has the right to adopt new rules at the start of the session without regard to the binding restrictions of the old rules as to how changes in them shall be made.

This seems to mean that while a new session of the Senate inherits rules, it can deny its inheritance and proceed as if rules did not exist. The net effect is the same as saying the Senate is not a continuing body, even though no reference is made to that particular term.

Under these circumstances I want to take my position emphatically on the side of the framers of our Constitution, of several former Presidents, of innumerable Members of this body, of distinguished historians and writers on the theory of government and of at least two Supreme Court decisions, all holding that the Senate is a continuing body with rules that survive intact from one session to the next, subject to change only under terms which the rules themselves provide.

I take this position not for reasons of expediency, with respect to legislative objectives, but because I am convinced that to give up the concept of the Senate as a continuing body will undermine a cornerstone of our Government and will threaten the foundation of State sovereignty and States rights on which our Federal Union was founded.

In my discussion, I shall review briefly the traditions of the Senate and the history underlying them; I shall point to features of our organizational structure which are characteristic only of continuing bodies and I shall quote from only a few of the authorities I have mentioned who, over the years, have reiterated their conviction that the Senate never dies.

It is my hope that this recitation of facts will convince any doubting colleagues of the wisdom of Woodrow Wilson when he said in his authoritative book on "Constitutional Government in the United States" (p. 127) that "the continuity of the government lies in the keeping of the Senate more than in the keeping of the Executive, even in respect of matters which are the especial prerogative of the Presidential office."

The Committee on Rules and Administration of the Senate on May 12, 1953 in reporting on Senate Resolution 20 stated: "Traditionally the Senate was created as a curb upon hasty action by the House of Representatives. It is a continuing body with one-third of its membership elected every 2 years, whose members, moreover, come from component parts of the Union."

To understand how true that simple statement is we must examine the history and traditions of this body.

What our Founding Fathers intended

The supreme objective of our Founding Fathers was to create a more effective union without conferring upon the new Federal Government enough power to destroy the sovereignty of the States. The keystone of that arch was the Senate, only one-third of which would be elected every 2 years as compared with the election every 2 years of the entire House membership. The need for maturity and experience in the legislative branch of the Government influenced the decision with respect to the continuity of the Senate. Alexander Hamilton in letter No. 63 of the Federalist referred to this point in clear and unmistakable terms when he said that the House of Representatives elected for the short term of 2 years should not be answerable for the final result of matters on which the general welfare may essentially depend. Then he added:

"The proper remedy for this defect must be an additional body in the legislative department, which, having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention and a train of measures may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects."

John Jay's "Federalist Letter No. 64" is to the same effect. In writing about the Convention's deliberations concerning Senators, he stated that it was felt that "they should continue in place a sufficient time to become perfectly acquainted with our traditional concerns and to form and introduce a system of the management of them. The duration prescribed is such as will give them an opportunity of greatly extending their political information, and of rendering their accumulating experience more and more beneficial to their country.

"Nor has the Convention discovered less prudence in providing for the frequent elections of Senators in such a way as to obviate the inconvenience of periodically transferring these great affairs entirely to new men—for, by leaving a considerable residue of old ones in place, uniformity, and order, as well as a constant succession of official information will be preserved."

In the Federalist No. 63 another pertinent statement appears:

"The necessity of a Senate is not less indicated by the propensity of all single and numerous assemblies, to yield to the impulse of sudden and violent passions, and to be seduced by factious leaders into intemperate and pernicious resolutions. The mutability in the public councils arising from a rapid succession of new members, however qualified they may be, points out in the strongest manner the necessity of some stable institution in the Government."

Senate rules history

That the framers of the Constitution intended for the Senate to be a continuing body is clearly indicated by article II, section 2 of the Constitution which says: "The President shall have the Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." Note that the reference is to a recess and the next meeting of one and the same Senate and not to appointments which will go to a new Senate. This principle applies to several of its continuing powers such as treaty ratifying powers and committee hearings between sessions of Congress, and those closest to the framing of the Constitution applied it to standing rules of procedure of the Senate—a precedent that never has been violated.

Except for a brief interval in the War Between the States action on Senate rules limiting debate has been taken only twice in the last 152 years. In 1917 Senator Thomas S. Martin, of my own Commonwealth of Virginia, submitted a resolution which became rule XXII and which remained in force until the Wherry-Hayden amendment was adopted in 1949. Two years prior to the 1917 change, the eminent Senator Elihu Root, of New York, delivered a masterful address on the Senate as a continuing body and the wisdom of unlimited debate (February 15, 1915, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 3793) in which he said:

"The Senate is a continuous body and its rules once adopted continue until they are changed."

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. James] had asked "Shall we be bound by these old dead hands?" "Yes," answered Root "unless we see fit to change the rule. Nor is it the dead hand alone that binds us; it is the observance and recognition of the rule at every session of the Senate for these 108 years. Bound by the men of a hundred years ago? No, bound by all the great and patriotic and wise and able men who have made the Senate of the United States for that century.

"The Senate not a continuing body? Why, sir, what happened here 2 years ago come the 4th of March? It was here in the Senate of the United States you were inducted into office. What happens when Congress adjourns? The House goes out of existence; there is a new House, and until that House is organized the statute says the Senate Committee is the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library. No reorganization is required."

The distinguished Senator from New York added "the purpose of rules is to establish a course of conduct which shall be a protection to the minority and preserve them in the performance of their duties against arbitrary repression on the part of the majority—and sir, there is no right of liberty in a republic more essential and vital than is the preservation and the protection of the minority in the performance of their duty.

"Otherwise, sir, why are we here at all? Why should not all of the members of the minority go to their homes? But, sir, if you do that there is an end of representative government; if you do that there is no occasion for the majority. If they destroy the functions of the minority they equally destroy the functions of the majority for they cannot perform the duties of representative government by holding a secret conclave.

"Sir, the only protection for this system of government by representation is to be found in these rules."

For the first time in its history the fact that the Senate is a continuing body was officially challenged from the Chair in an opinion of the Vice President delivered in January 1957, in which he said:

"Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed, is in the opinion of the Chair unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect.

"The Chair emphasizes that this is only his own opinion because under Senate precedents a question of constitutionality can only be decided by the Senate itself" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 103, pt. 1, pp. 178–179). The Senate did not vote on the point of constitutionality, as the motion to lay on the table the proposal to amend the rules carried.

The Vice President in his statement of January 4, 1957, admitted that there is a great volume of written comment and opinion to the effect that the Senate is a continuing body with continuing rules. "The constitutional provision," he said, "under which only one-third of the Senate membership is changed by election in each Congress can only be construed to indicate the intent of the framers that the Senate should be a continuing parliamentary body for at least some purposes. By practice for 167 years the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another."

The Vice President, however, then stated that the provision of the Constitution that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings bothered him and he said that section 3 was unconstitutional. With this I disagree. It is a refutation of the traditional concept of the continuity of the Senate, a refutation of the clear intent of the framers of the Constitution that the Senate be a continuing body, not for some purpose as claimed by the Vice President but for all purposes. As a continuing body we have adopted rules of procedure to fit our unique legislative functions. Those rules are constitutional and they are binding on us today. There can be no cloture on a motion to proceed to consider changing the rules and the requirements of the rules remain effective unless and until changed.

Views on continuity a century ago

Some of the most direct statements on the Senate being a continuing body were made in 1841 in the controversy over the Senate printers. The Senate in the 26th Congress had elected printers on February 20, 1841, as its printers for the succeeding Congress. On March 4 of that year the political complexion of the Senate changed. The Senate organized by reelecting its President pro tempore and sat in special session until March 14. The House of Representatives adjourned sine die and was not in session after March 4. On March 4 a resolution was introduced to dismiss the printers. Irrespective of the Senate's right to dismiss printers for cause, contractual or otherwise, the debate involved as a collateral item the continuous nature of the Senate. Some even stated that the next Senate would be a new Senate, to which Senator Allen, of Ohio, replied, according to the Congressional Globe, as follows:

"And as to the assertion that this was a new Senate, he denied the fact. The argument so much relied on in this discussion and on which so much logic and reasoning had been wasted in opposition to these printers was untrue. There was no such thing as a new Senate known to the Constitution of this Republic. They might as well speak of a new Supreme Court as of a new Senate. There was a new House of Representatives—but not so the Senate. The Constitution replenishes that body every 2 years by the election of a class of Senators, and thereby gives eternity to the duration of the body. There was no new, nor was there any old Senate."

On March 8, 1841, Senator Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, later President of the United States, made a most pertinent statement, which was summarized in the Globe as follows:

"There could be no new Senate. This was the very same body, constitutionally and in point of law, which had assembled on the first day of its meeting in 1789. It has existed without any intermission from that day until the present moment, and would continue to exist as long as the Government should endure. It was emphatically a permanent body. Its rules were permanent and were not adopted from Congress to Congress like those of the House of Representatives. For many years after the commencement of the Government its Secretary was a permanent officer, though our rules now require that he should be elected at stated intervals. The Senate always had a President, and there were always two-thirds of its actual Members in existence, and generally a much greater number. It would be useless to labor this question. Every writer, without exception, who had treated on the subject had declared the Senate to be a permanent body. It never dies; and it was the sheet anchor of the Constitution on account of its permanency. Senators were thus deprived of the poor apology that one Senate had no right to bind its successors." (Congressional Globe, 26th Cong., 2d sess., vol. 9, p. 240.)

It may be noted in this controversy in which the printers were ultimately dismissed that Senator Henry Clay, of Kentucky, although he personally was in favor of limiting debate at times as opposed to John C. Calhoun who was a forceful and outspoken proponent of unlimited debate, voted to dismiss the printers but argued that the Senate was a continuing body. On this the Legislative Reference Division, Library of Congress, in commenting on the Congressional Globe of March 11, 1841, stated:

"But a vote to dismiss its printers was not necessarily a vote that the Senate was discontinuous. One of the Senators who advocated and voted for the dismissal, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, agreed with the opposition that the Senate was everlasting. And if the proponents of the discontinuity view were, in fact, more numerous than its opponents the reports in the Congressional Globe—wholly fail to indicate it." (Senate Rules and the Senate as a Continuing Body, Doc. No. 4, 83d Cong., 1st sess., p. 31 appendix.)

Other illustrations of continuity

There are four fields that warrant special attention as illustrating the continuing nature of the Senate. These are (1) officers of the Senate, (2) Senate committees, (3) the Senate as an executive body, and (4) the treaty ratifying power.

Officers of the Senate serve no stated term of office. They serve until their successors are selected. Benjamin Harrison, former President of the United States and U.S. Senator, pointed this out in his book entitled "This Country of Ours," page 51. George H. Haynes in "The Senate of the United States," volume 1, page 261, points out the same thing as an illustration of the continuing nature of the Senate. Senator Anthony on March 24, 1879, while the Senate was in the process of replacing some of its officers with others along purely political lines, observed: "The Senate never dies. The same which it was when it met in 1789, it is now, and has held continuous and unbroken existence ever since. Its officers have naturally partaken of its permanent character. Its elective officers are chosen, not for a definite period, but during the pleasure of the Senate." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 147.)

With respect to the President pro tempore of the Senate, there have been several significant expressions regarding the continuing nature of the Senate applying to that office. In Senate Report 3, 44th Congress, 1st session, page 2, dated January 10, 1876, the Committee on Privileges and Elections made a survey of the customary procedure regarding the office of President pro tempore. It cited 49 instances where the office held over after the first recess and only 4 where it did not. The report also stated:

"The custom of the Vice President to vacate the chair before the close of a session to enable the Senate to choose a President pro tempore did not begin until after the passage of the act of March 1, 1792, and was obviously instituted to meet the contingency contemplated in the act by providing a President pro tempore of the Senate during the vacations of that body. The Senate in contemplation of law is a perpetual body, and the officers of the Senate are as much its officers during its vacations as during its sessions."

A resolution providing that the tenure of office of President pro tempore of the Senate does not expire at the meeting of Congress after the first recess, the Vice President not having appeared to take the chair was unanimously adopted January 10, 1876. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 4, p. 316.) Senator Merriman made the following statement:

"I want to emphasize the matter. This resolution is adopted unanimously. It is a resolution that affects the organization of the body for all time to come and establishes a precedent.

Two days later the Senate adopted a resolution stating that "The office of President pro tempore is held at the pleasure of the Senate." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 12, 1876, pp. 360–373.)

On March 2, 1891, Senator Charles F. Manderson was elected President pro tempore to hold office during the pleasure of the Senate in accordance with the resolution of March 12, 1890 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 22, p. 3637) with the intention apparently that his office would continue over into the following Congress. Subsequent Presidents pro tempore were regularly elected with reference to this same resolution. Numerous instances in history are cited in Gilfry's compilation "President of the Senate pro tempore" of those officers holding over from one Congress to the next.

It is a well-accepted custom that the Senate can and does order investigations, interim reports, final reports, and recommendations by its committees, without reference to the ending of one Congress or the beginning of another. Even when there is some change in the composition of the committee membership, this procedure is not affected. While the House has no such rule, the Senate has provided by rule XXV that all standing committees continue until their successors are appointed. Haynes, in his treatise on the U.S. Senate, not only recognizes this point but attributes the growth of Senate committee activity to it. He states (p. 551): "But increasingly, beginning with the last quarter of the 19th century, the House has seemed to be relinquishing such activities, while the Senate has been greatly expanding its exercise of the investigative function in the number, variety, and importance of its inquiries. The explanation of this remarkable shift is to be found in the contrast between the rules and procedure of the House and of the Senate."

The functions of the Senate for various executive rather than purely legislative purposes offer further arguments on behalf of continuity. The Constitution gives the Senate prerogatives in giving or withholding "advice and consent" to certain Presidential appointments and with respect to treaty-making. Prior to enactment in 1933 of the 20th amendment to the Constitution which, among other things, abolished the so-called "lameduck" sessions of the Congress and which advanced the commencement of the Presidential term from March 4 to January 20, many special sessions of the Senate as distinguished from special sessions of the Congress were convened for executive purposes.

It is appropriate to note that while executive nominations not disposed of in the Senate die with the Congress in which they are submitted, treaties transmitted to the Senate for ratification do not so die. Rule XXXVII of the Senate provides that all proceedings on treaties shall terminate with the Congress but that they shall be resumed at the commencement of the next Congress as if no proceedings had previously been had thereon. Thus unless withdrawn by the President or failing from lapse of time a treaty continues to be live matter and, as such, continues as pending in the Senate.

Continuity as a matter of law

Now, Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the fact that the Senate can resolve this issue as it pleases. It can close its eyes to the clear meaning of the Constitution and precedents in support thereof and its ears to all arguments as to what is best for the preservation of our democratic institution. But since many of my colleagues proclaim court decisions as "the law of the land" I take pleasure in citing two Supreme Court decisions that hold that the Senate is a continuing body.

In McGrain v. Dougherty (273 U.S. 135, 180–182) the Court stated:

"The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives, whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate which is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

"Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says 'The Senate as a continuing body may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of Congress' and after quoting the above statement of Jefferson's Manual, he says: 'The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of Congress' * * *. This being so, the Senate being a continuing body, the case cannot be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense." (See also Hinds' Precedents, vol. 4, secs. 4396, 4400, 4404, 4405.)

The Supreme Court reiterated the doctrine of McGrain v. Dougherty in the case of Sinclair v. U.S. (279 U.S. 263, 295–296 (1928)). A witness at a Senate committee hearing refused to answer a question on the grounds that the investigation and the question were unauthorized. He was prosecuted for contempt and convicted. The appeal involved the point that the same Congress was not in session. The Court quoted the resolution of the Senate authorizing the committee to sit after the expiration of the then current Congress and until otherwise ordered by the Senate, and stated:

"The sole purpose was to authorize the committee to carry on the inquiry. It would be quite unreasonable if not indeed absurd for the Senate to direct investigation by the committee and to allow its power to summon and swear witnesses to lapse." The conviction was affirmed. Since the continuing nature of the Senate was a necessary point in the appeal, this case is a holding by the Court that the Senate is a continuing body. The reference thus is not merely dictum.

Both of these Supreme Court cases have been cited in numerous Federal decisions. For example, the McGrain case was cited in Merford v. U.S. (176 F. 2d 54 (D.C. 1949)) to show that the basic intent of Congress in establishing committees must be followed and in Barsh v. U.S. (167 F. 2d 241 (D.C. 1948)) on the point of a question being authorized as within the powers of a committee. The Sinclair case appears frequently in Federal citations. In U.S. v. Josephson (165 F. 2d 82 (2d circuit, 1948)) on the point of the courts turning to congressional practice to show congressional intent. The Sinclair case, citing the McGrain case, settled the issue of Senate continuity insofar as the Supreme Court is concerned.

An analogous decision is to be found in a State court. In the New York case of People ex rel. Lazarus v. Coleman (91 N.Y.S. 432, 433 99 App. Div. 88), the question was on a writ of mandamus running against a governmental board for a wrong done by a previous board. The terms of office of board members expired at different times somewhat analogous to the U.S. Senate. The court held that it was a continuing body and allowed the writ. The court stated:

"The terms of office expire at different times. It is therefore a continuing body and a writ of mandamus running against the board to reinstate the relator would accomplish that result whether the board was composed of the same persons who passed the resolution resulting in his dismissal or not."

The same principle involved in this case has been upheld in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Thompson v. U.S. (103 U.S. 480 26 L. Ed. 521).

The legal approach and the court decision I have cited may be summarized as follows:

1. The Constitution provides that two-thirds of the Members of the Senate shall be continuous at all times in their tenure of office, and that the President shall have power to fill vacancies "during the recess of the Senate."

2. The Senate is more than an upper house as the terms "upper and lower houses" are often used historically or parenthetically. The Senate at law is assigned definite and distinct duties and prerogatives.

(a) It has the sole power to try all impeachments.

(b) It has the power to give or withhold advice and consent in the making of treaties and the nomination and appointment of Ambassadors, Judges of the Supreme Court, and certain officers of the executive branch of the Government.

(c) With the exception of bills for raising revenue, in which it may propose or concur with amendments, it may originate legislation.

3. The Senate may constitute committees with duties and powers to operate continuously or for times certain irrespective of the beginnings or endings of the terms of Congress. This point has been litigated in the courts and the continuing nature of committees of the Senate has been clearly recognized. If it were not such a body itself, its committees could not be continuous.

4. There are definitions at law of what is continuous which by comparison apply to the factual position of the Senate. In cases where courts have had jurisdiction over governmental bodies composed of members elected or appointed at different times on a successive basis such bodies at law have been held to be continuing bodies.

I submit that by all legal, factual and traditional standards the Senate of the United States is a continuing body.

Time has fixed the true character of our Government—a Federal union of sovereign States, with a Senate as a continuing body. How pertinent to the proposal to abandon that time-tested principle are these words from George Washington's farewell address:

"In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion."

The Senate as a continuing body is an integral part of our unique form of Government and by the sure standard of experience Senate rules that carry over from one session to the next are essential to the proper discharge of the duties we owe to our respective States and the people thereof.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished colleague the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Oklahoma has delivered a magnificent dissertation affirming the proposition that the Senate is a continuing body. I feel the statements he has made in the Senate today are worthy of the attention of the American people. A little later in the day I myself hope to have a few remarks to make. I did not want this opportunity to pass without commending the Senator from Oklahoma for the splendid statement he has made on this subject.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very grateful to my colleague.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think a statement should be made as to the purpose of the motion——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to present a unanimous-consent request? The request is that there be a quorum call, but that the Senator from New Mexico will retain his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for that purpose?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be a quorum call, but that at the conclusion of the call the Senator from New Mexico will retain the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, my interest in the proposal to adopt rules at the beginning of the session is based upon enough experience to know that if we do not act on the rules now, we will never have opportunity to act during this session. We have been discussing this situation through a number of sessions of Congress.

In 1953 a motion was made that the Senate proceed to the adoption of rules. At that time there was a considerable discussion about the possibility that a new proposal would soon be before us; that it could be acted upon and that the Senate in an orderly fashion could proceed to deal with the question.

The late Senator Taft on January 6, 1953, when he was commenting on the matter, pointed out how vitally necessary it was that the Senate be regarded as a continuing body, so that its rules would carry over from Congress to Congress, and so that when the 20th of January arrived and new Cabinet officers took office, we would not be involved in a whole series of arguments about rules.

I quote from him:

If we should be involved in a rules fight the discussion could go on forever. In fact, I would venture to say that if there were a majority in the Senate who wished to adopt the procedure suggested by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the discussion would proceed almost indefinitely. We would continue the debate for a month in order to break the filibuster that might develop under such circumstances. Therefore I believe it is exceedingly unfortunate to raise the controversy regarding the rules at this time, and contend the Senate must begin all over again at the beginning of the session and confront all the uncertain and difficult questions which could arise under those circumstances.

After he finished that statement, there were many comments. Among other things was a comment by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] who referred to the proceedings in the Committee on Rules and Administration. He said:

If I recall correctly from conversations with the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. Jenner], if he assumes the chairmanship of the Rules Committee I am confident one of his first acts will be to try to bring such modification to the floor of the Senate.

Senator Jenner left no one in doubt as to what his program was to be. He said:

When the order of business calling for the introduction of bills and resolutions is reached, I shall offer the resolution which is based upon a report, Report No. 1256, which came from the Rules Committee at the last session. I think its adoption will take care of a great deal of the controversy which has arisen over the cloture rule. I propose to offer the resolution to which I have referred at the first opportunity during the present session of the Congress.

He did so; and the resolution came from the committee. It did exactly what everyone expected it to do. It remained on the Calendar of the Senate without any thought that it would ever be acted upon. No one would have been foolish enough to believe that it would be called up and actually debated, because there was a constant repetition of the statement that if that should happen, it might lead to the passage of some other legislation; and, of course, that would have been tragic to the hopes and beliefs of some Members of the Senate.

That situation occurs every 2 years, as Senator Jenner pointed out in 1953, The previous Congress, which had finished its business in 1952, had tried to wrestle with the same problem. The Committee on Rules and Administration, after long hearings, had submitted a report. That report was referred to by the then Senator from Indiana, and he was willing to concede that when it reached the floor of the Senate everything would be wonderful.

However, I point out that nothing happened. So, in 1957, an attempt was again made to see if it would be possible, at the beginning of the session, to adopt rules which might be more representative of majority will in the Senate, or might lead to the ability more quickly to change the rules if the Senate thought it necessary.

As in 1953, that resolution, proposing the adoption of new rules, came to the floor of the Senate. A motion was made to table it, and the 1953 procedure was duplicated.

I point out that in 1953 the motion was made by the then majority leader, and it was concurred in by a great many other Members. Those wanting to adopt new rules were able to receive the support of only 21 Members of the Senate.

In 1957 there was a somewhat different situation. We had considerably more support; but again the same statement was made—"Do not worry about this. Within a very short time something will happen." I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 1, page 210, in which the then able minority leader [Mr. KNOWLAND] was speaking. He said:

I believe the correct procedure would be to have the bill introduced next Monday, when Senators will be able to introduce bills, to urge early committee hearings, to have it reported to the Senate, and to debate it fairly and fully, as it should be debated, affecting as it does many citizens in all parts of our country. We shall have a committee to which to refer such a bill next Monday, if the Senate has any rules under which to proceed. We shall have a Committee on Foreign Relations to which to refer the President's message which will be delivered tomorrow, if the Senate has rules tomorrow. But whether the Senate has rules or not apparently will depend to no small extent upon whether this body in its judgment lays on the table the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

I point out that that might have been a very sound position. I know that it was an honest position, taken by a very honest man. At the same time, I think it should be pointed out that the situation since has changed considerably, by reason of the ruling by the Vice President that the Senate continues to operate under rules of the previous Congress until they are changed.

The Vice President says that, in his opinion, the old rules are not applicable as to certain sections, which may be unconstitutional—I hope I am quoting him correctly—but that as to the remainder of the rules, in the absence of some affirmative action, the Senate could properly be regarded as proceeding under them.

Therefore, I do not see how it can be said that if we take the proposed action there will be a great legislative hiatus, in which nothing can be done because we shall have no rules. If Senators rely on the assurance of the Vice President that we have some sort of rules in the meantime, they should not say in the next breath, "We shall have no rules whatever if the so-called Anderson motion is adopted."

I continue to quote from the then minority leader, former Senator Knowland:

On Monday next, when it will be possible to introduce proposed legislation in the Senate, I shall introduce, and I shall ask all my colleagues on this side of the aisle, and I hope many of them on the other side of the aisle to join with me, a proposal to amend rule 22 of the Senate. I cannot introduce such a proposal now, under the general agreement, but I should like to read it to the Senate.

I do not say this proposal is the final solution. I do not say, after a committee has met, after hearings have been had, after testimony has been taken, after there has been a study made of the traditions of 167 years and the needs of the present, that the proposal may not be greatly improved. That is what we have committees for. But I propose to introduce, on behalf of myself and any other Senator who cares to join me, a proposal which reads:

"That subsection 2 of rule 22 of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out 'except subsection 3 of rule 22,' and (2) by striking out 'two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn,' and inserting in lieu thereof 'two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.' "

Section 2 would read:

"Subsection 3 of rule 22 of the Standing Rules of the Senate is repealed."

That is what the then minority leader thought he would be able to do. He said he planned to do it. Certainly he felt that some action would be taken. He submitted a resolution very similar to the language which I have quoted. There was a change in reference to the terms of subsection 3. Instead of repealing it, a provision was written in for continuing action.

That resolution was joined in by the majority leader and by many other Members of the Senate. Many believed that it might see the light of day, but there were some of us who did not. I know that I did not, because, if we look back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 103, part 1, page 213, it will be found that I said:

Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from California will find that he can send his resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration, but that after weeks and after months it will not see the light of day on the floor of the Senate. It will not see the light of day on the floor, any more than did the resolution of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Jenner].

I ask Senators: Who was right and who was wrong? It is true that the committee wrestled with this problem and reported a resolution.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the resolution which the committee reported was not the so-called Johnson-Knowland resolution, but, rather, Senate Resolution 17, proposed by the Senator from Illinois and 14 other Senators, and that it was that resolution which by a vote of 5 to 4 was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Rules and Administration?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. I was only trying to point out that all we were saying then was that this question can be settled by majority action on the floor of the Senate, and that what the Committee on Rules and Administration reported, even though it might have approved the original suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, became the action of the committee, and that if it had come to the floor of the Senate I believe it would have become the action of the Senate.

However, once it got on the calendar, it hit the biggest stone wall in existence in the city of Washington. We may change the portion of the Capitol front which faces the place where we inaugurate Presidents, and that granite may not be too secure, but the stone wall that stood against that resolution reaching the floor of the Senate will never be broken unless we do it at the beginning of a session, and in the fashion I have proposed, which has been studied for a long while, and which is being presented to the Senate today.

It was well known then that that resolution would not reach the floor of the Senate and would not be adopted. I pointed out that the Committee on Rules and Administration wrestled with the matter. It labored for a long time in the previous session. I said that it labored and brought forth a mouse. That is what happened last year. The resolution was placed on the calendar, and there it remained quietly; no one ever moved to consider it.

So here we are again. I only say that with that sort of experience, I do not understand how it can be contended that the proposal will be taken up in due course later in the session. For example, in the resolution which has been submitted, Senate Resolution 5, there is a provision to which some persons take pretty strong exception. That section of the resolution provides that the rules of the Senate shall continue in force. An effort may be made to strike that section from the resolution. If it should be made, it could result in a discussion which would go on for weeks on end.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. In view of what the Senator from New Mexico has just said with relation to section 2 of Senate Resolution 5, the so-called Johnson resolution, does not the Senator from New Mexico feel that section 2 is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, which gives to the Senate, as it gives to each branch of Congress, the right to make its own rules?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh yes. I wish to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I feel very deeply that that is true. I say that because I was a Member of the Senate which perpetrated on the Senate a very bad rule. In 1949 we had a controversy on this subject, and we emerged with a very bad rule.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. Yesterday we witnessed a very historic event in the Senate. We swore in two Senators from the new State of Alaska. In effect, under section 2 of Senate Resolution 5—and let us assume that Hawaii will also become a State in the future—we would be saying to the newly elected Senators from Alaska and from Hawaii: "Your States may send you here to the Senate. You come here with the full importance and prestige of Senators of the United States, but you cannot make the rules which will guide your action. That will have to be left to someone else who was here years before—perhaps 10 years before—when these rules were adopted. They made the rules for you, and you cannot exercise your right under the Constitution of the United States to assist in making the rules which will guide your actions, even though you will serve as the duly elected representatives of the great States of Alaska and Hawaii."

That is what we are asked to do. Mr. President, we are not talking about expediency. We have before us a fundamental constitutional legal question which must be decided. It is true we are faced with the question of expediency, on the one hand, but, on the other, the question is whether we have a right to adopt our own rules. We are not debating the expediencies of the moment.

We are debating the fundamental and constitutional legal question involved, which is the question of whether the Senate shall have the right to make the rules which will guide its actions.

We are saying to the Senators from the great State of Alaska: "You have been sent here to serve your people and to serve your State. We have provided you with a beautiful desk and we have provided you with a fine chair in which you can sit comfortably. However, you cannot do one thing, and that is, you cannot pass on the rules which will govern your actions in the Senate."

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Rhode Island is completely right. Not only are we dealing with a new State, the State of Alaska, but we are also dealing with a great many other States which have changed their positions recently. For example, the State of West Virginia very recently had two Senators in the Senate from one political party. Now it has two Senators from another political party. Yet we say to these two Senators, "You have come to the Senate because the people of your State desired to change its representation. You can come into our body, but you must accept the rules which we have adopted."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Mexico have made two very significant points. Of the 98 Senators who are now serving in the Senate, only 28 voted or were announced for the existing rule in 1949. Sixty Members of the present Senate were not in the Senate at that time. Ten Members of the Senate who are now in the Senate—and the Senator from Illinois is one of them—who were Members in 1949 voted or were announced against the resolution.

The question which the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Mexico have brought up is this: Shall the vote of 28 Senators in 1949 be binding upon 98 Senators in 1959?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is entirely correct. That is the one principle which has moved me in this whole consideration. I was a Member of the Senate in 1949. At that time it could have been provided that it should take 64 or 74 or 84 or 94 or 95 Senators to change the rules. The advocates of the proposal at that time had the votes to do it. They might just as well have said that the rules of the Senate shall never be changed except by the vote of 90 Senators or 94 Senators or 95 Senators—yes; they could just as well have said that it shall be by unanimous vote.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. The argument has been made here—and it has been made dramatically and graphically—that Senate Resolution 5 presents an opportunity for a majority to exert its will. How paradoxical can we become? The resolution reads, in section 2:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

We are telling a future majority, which may come here in the next 2 years, "You have no business to pass upon these rules. You must abide by the rules which were adopted by a previous Congress, because they said then—whether they are here now or not—that these are the rules that will bind you."

That is undemocratic. Beyond the fact that such procedure violates the Constitution of the United States, which gives to each Senate the right to make its own rules, it is dynasty in its worst form. How pretentious can we become?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Reference has been made to the book I hold in my hand. It has been called the rulebook. Of course, it is the "Senate Manual," which contains the rules of the Senate. It contains some rules written by Thomas Jefferson, in "Jefferson's Manual." We have followed some of the precedents in "Jefferson's Manual." Thomas Jefferson has not been here for 150 years. Do my colleagues wish with regard to Thomas Jefferson and with respect to the rest of the rules to do the same thing that is proposed?

The book also contains the "Declaration of Independence." Do the Senators wish to throw that out, too, now that Thomas Jefferson is gone?

I see in the book also the Constitution, which was written by men who have not been here for a 150 years. Do Senators wish to do away with those portions of the "Manual"?

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may propound a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana, For what rules of the Senate did Thomas Jefferson vote?

Mr. LONG. I did not hear the question.

Mr. PASTORE. For what rules of the Senate did Thomas Jefferson vote, that we are violating now? We are talking about the right of the Senate to make its own rules. If we do not have rules, we can vote for the parliamentary rules which have been prescribed by Thomas Jefferson, or we can adopt "Robert's Rules of Order." That may be so. All I am saying is that fundamentally, under the Constitution, it has been decided that the Senate can make its own rules. But which Senate? The Senate of 1800 or the Senate of 1959? I say that if the Senate of 1959 has the responsibility to do the people's business, it ought to have the responsibility of adopting its own rules.

Mr. LONG. That is what we are trying to do. We are attempting to change some of our rules. Our rules include precedents which have been handed down to us. Those precedents oftentimes are binding on the Senate. They have been adopted together with the rules.

If we look at "Jefferson's Manual," we find that the rules do not provide for certain things in certain circumstances.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was just about to quote Thomas Jefferson. He said:

> Can one generation bind another, and all others, in succession forever?
> I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead.

In the Senate of the United States, I say to the Senator from Louisiana, we ought to write rules for the living, not the dead. New Senators come to this body, and there is no reason why those new Senators should be told that they are Senators in every respect except in the right to make rules. They should not be told, "You are vassals when it comes to writing rules. The Senators who were present in 1949 have said how you should live here. You have not a word to say for yourselves about how you shall live."

The Senator from Louisiana was present at that time, as I was, but there are Senators here today who were not Senators in 1949. Those Senators, when they took the oath of office, had just as many rights here as the Senator from Louisiana, the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from New Mexico had when they became Senators.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from New Mexico helped to write those rules.

Mr. ANDERSON. I helped in trying to keep from changing them.

Mr. LONG. I voted for the rule which the Senator is discussing. I cannot recall whether the Senator from New Mexico voted for it or not. But I know he was here to vote on it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have listened to the interrogations and the answers which have been given, and I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico another question. Will he be so kind as to tell me why the adoption of the Johnson resolution would deprive the Senate of any power to change rules by a majority vote?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Johnson resolution contains section 3, which provides a new section 2, and that section 2 will read:

> The rules of the Senate shall continue from one Congress to the next Congress unless they are changed as provided in these rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Are not the rules of the Senate as they now exist, with the exception of rule XXII, against which I shall vote, amply sufficient to allow the Senate to change its rules by majority vote at any time?

Mr. ANDERSON. No. I think the ruling has been made, round after round, that it requires a sizable vote—no; not a sizable vote, but a majority vote, to get the question before the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But the Johnson amendment strikes out that provision.

Mr. ANDERSON. It would still require a two-thirds vote to impose cloture.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I beg the Senator's pardon. That provision is stricken out by the Johnson amendment, so that it cannot continue from generation to generation or from Congress to Congress if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am sorry, but that still does not happen to be the case, in my opinion. This provision says that the rules are to continue in effect unless they are changed.

In the succeeding Congress, the one which will begin in 1961, the able Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] might rise and say, "I move that the rules of the Senate be changed in the following particulars." He must be able to enforce cloture to secure consideration of his motion. He must obtain a two-thirds vote of the Senate to reach that point.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not if the Johnson amendment prevails.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes. The Johnson amendment abolishes the provision which has to do with the inability to apply cloture. There was a provision written in 1949 which was a part of the sacrifice we went through, a part of the enslaving operation we went through.

I only want to say—and I say it with reluctance, because for a long time I was a member of a committee presided over by the able Senator from Wyoming, and I have tremendous respect for his legal and parliamentary ability—that the Johnson resolution would have a tendency to accomplish three things. One is to change "two-thirds of those duly chosen"—which means 64—to "two-thirds of those present and voting."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. That might involve one vote, possibly two votes at times, but would result in practically nothing.

The second modification is in that provision of the rule which provides that we shall never have cloture on a proposal to change the rules. There can be cloture on a change in the rules, but there is no change in the two-thirds requirement to obtain cloture.

The third thing which the resolution does, and it is a dangerous thing, which ought to bring about its defeat, is that at the beginning of each session the rules are to continue in force unless they are changed by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from New Mexico is not answering my simple question. I should like to know how, by the adoption of the Johnson resolution, we shall deny to the Senate the power, by a majority vote, to change its rules whenever it wants to do so.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is nothing said about a majority vote. I have said it takes a two-thirds vote to get the question up. We could change that if a resolution to change the rules were acted upon, but we could not get such a resolution before the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No one is objecting to bringing up the Johnson resolution except the Senator from New Mexico and his associates.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Wyoming should not say that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is the Senator's argument.

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is not the Senator's argument now precisely this, That if the Johnson resolution shall be adopted, the two-thirds requirement and the requirement forbidding the application of rule XXII to motions to change the rules would still persist in spite of the adoption of the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How could that be so? If we adopted by a majority vote a rule which struck out the exception in section 3 of the present rule providing that cloture shall never apply to a motion to change the rules—we are trying to abandon that; we want to kill it—what complaint would the Senator have against the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. We have had a ruling by the Chair that we can proceed to adopt rules by a majority vote at the beginning of a session. The resolution is intended to bring about a situation in which the Senate cannot adopt rules at the beginning of a session. I think that would be just as unconstitutional as the present situation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is nothing at all in the resolution which changes the time when a change in the rules may be brought about. We are simply undertaking now to change one rule, to liberalize it so as to destroy one of the basic, fundamental foundations upon which the filibuster rests. If we kill that—and those of us who are supporting the Johnson resolution say it does that—and if a majority of the Senate votes for that proposal, then what change has been made?

Year after year, throughout the existence of the Senate, the rules of the Senate have continued unless changed, and they would continue now. No constitutional right to change the rules is interfered with at all.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. I think, strictly speaking and legalistically speaking, the Senator from Wyoming is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do, too.

Mr. PASTORE. But we are missing an important point. It is true that the resolution which is now pending before the Senate is the basis for the majority of the Senate to exert its will. There is no question at all about that. It is true that we can, by a motion to strike out, knock out subsection 2 of section 3.

But we are losing sight of the fact that the Johnson resolution tries to establish the fact that the Senate is a continuing body. What the Senator from New Mexico is trying to do is to preserve for all posterity the right of each Senate to make its own rules. That is where we differ.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are not trying to do anything of the kind. There is nothing in anything which is pending before the Senate—there is nothing in the Johnson resolution—which will prevent any future Senate from changing the rules.

Mr. PASTORE. Absolutely, because in the future the Senate will have to change the rules not by majority vote, but under the existing rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not at all.

Mr. PASTORE. And the existing rule does not provide that cloture can be invoked by only two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

In debating this question, Senators can be as nice as they please; but, fundamentally by means of this resolution we are trying to preserve the existing rule, which permits a Senator who is joined by one-third of his colleagues to thwart the will of a majority.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say——

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes, but I was begging the Senator to permit me to say a word.

Mr. PASTORE. I shall yield later, if the Senator will permit me to finish.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course. Let me ask the Senator to read rule XL of the existing rules of the Senate. When he reads it, he will see that all that is necessary is that a Senator file a notice that a change of a rule is desired——

Mr. PASTORE. But if such a notice is filed, it will have to be referred to a committee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What is wrong with that?

Mr. PASTORE. But if the rule is not changed before such a motion is called up, cloture cannot be invoked in any way.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I beg my colleague's pardon. If the notice is given and if there is agreement that it will not have to go over to the next day, it will not have to go over.

Mr. PASTORE. But if one-third of the Senators talk and talk and continue to talk—and that is all that the word "filibuster" means—in order to prevent the taking of a vote, a vote will not be taken. I say very frankly that if that is not the reason why that provision was originally written into the rule, all of us are wasting our time in speaking about this matter. What is being sought here is to preserve the right of a small minority to filibuster. Why? In order to prevent the exercise of the will of a majority of the Senate. No matter how one may state the matter, that is what it is sought to do.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, when we seek to read the history of the Senate rules, we find that even the Library of Congress does not have a copy of them. One has to hunt for a long time, in order to find some of these things—as I have done over the past 6 or 7 years.

But when we read the debate which occurred in 1917, we realize that when Senator Thomas Walsh made his statements and his proposals, he thought he was plugging up the loophole and was establishing a workable cloture rule; he thought so very firmly, and so did other Senators. But when that rule actually went into operation, it was found—at a later date—that the rule applied only to a question which was before the Senate and was the business of the Senate, and that there could be no effective cloture on a motion to take up. That was an astonishing proposition; and some of us are worried that if the language about the rules continuing in force is included, it may be found, at a later date, that a Presiding Officer may hold that the rules continue in force, and that therefore a two-thirds vote would be required.

I realize that the Senator from Wyoming wishes to permit such action to be taken by majority vote at the beginning of a session.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes. I dispute the proposition that if it is not done then by majority vote, it cannot be done later. My view is that at any time we please, we can change rule XL; and my view is that when the cloture rule was established in 1917—and at that time I was here; I was the secretary to a Senator when that debate occurred, and I know what the decision was—the decision made was to make two-thirds of the Senators present and voting the authority which could stop debate. That decision was made because the great bulk of the Members of the Senate believed that the Senate, being the only forum for free debate, should not run the risk of enabling a mere majority of a quorum to cut off debate. In the present Senate there are 98 Members; a quorum consists of 51 Members; a majority of a quorum, therefore, consists of only 26 Members. It was the feeling of the Senate in 1917 that two-thirds of the Senators present and voting should be required to shut off debate, rather than leaving that decision—to limit debate on any subject—to a mere 26 Members.

Mr. ANDERSON. But I have tried to point out that things which sometimes are not anticipated do develop, and that a provision that the rules are continuous can grow into something quite different.

The Senator from Wyoming suggests that all that is necessary is to file a notice, under rule XL, and then the matter will go to the Senate calendar, and it will be necessary only for a Senator to be recognized, in order to call it up. But the actual practice of the Senate is—as everyone knows—that the majority leader is recognized. Some of us found that out yesterday, and have found it out steadily. The majority leader is recognized. If he chooses to yield, in order to permit another Senator to make a motion to bring some matter before the Senate, well and good. But if the majority leader does not yield for that purpose, a Senator can file a motion, and it can be on the calendar for 40 days and 40 nights, but nothing will happen in connection with his motion, any more than anything happened when a proposal to change the rules of the Senate was reported. It got on the calendar, but no Senator was foolish enough to believe that it would ever leave the calendar and be taken up on the floor of the Senate.

Of course, it is true that if such a question came before the Senate, action on it could be taken by majority vote. But that is one of the things that it is absolutely impossible to have taken up on the floor, if there is opposition by the leadership.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In view of this colloquy, I believe it to be of the gravest importance that all Senators understand that Senators who vote in favor of the Johnson resolution will be voting in favor of a continuation of the right to engage in a filibuster, and will be voting in favor of continuing to permit a small minority to have the ability to hold up the taking of action by the Senate, and in effect will be voting to prevent the making of any substantial change in the rule which is not desired by almost a unanimous Senate.

When my good friend, the Senator from Wyoming—for whom I have the highest regard, and under whose tutelage I have learned so much in the past 2 years—says that if the Johnson resolution is adopted, the rules of the Senate can be changed by majority vote, let me say, with all due deference, that he is being far from realistic, because every Senator knows that cloture can be invoked only by the votes of 66 Senators, and without cloture a change in the rules will never be made.

The Johnson resolution will permit a continuing filibuster. If the Johson resolution is adopted, the Senate will not have the power to act as it should in the space age, and will not have the power to do the things necessary to be done in order to rehabilitate our country and to put it back in the forefront of freedom. On the contrary, that power of the Senate will be seriously handicapped if the Johnson amendment is adopted, because in that event Senators will have immobilized themselves from the taking of effective action, and will have put themselves into the hands of a small minority who wish to preserve the status quo, not only in our country, but throughout the free world.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has yielded to me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand; but I ask the Senator from New York to withhold his request for a moment.

Mr. JAVITS. Very well.

Mr. ANDERSON. In that case, I yield now to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wish to speak now in response to what was stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. He said that 66 votes would be necessary. However, that is not correct, because the Johnson resolution would reduce the cloture majority required from two-thirds of the constitutional number of Senators to two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

Mr. CLARK. Let us settle, then, for 64 or 63 votes. The Senator from Wyoming has seen many an ailing Senator come into the Chamber in a wheelchair, in order to participate in the voting on an important question; and I am sure that the Senator from Wyoming knows that few Senators would be absent when the vote on such an important question was taken.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But conceivably cloture could then be invoked by the votes of 34 Senators.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from New Mexico, instead of discussing the question and the issue now before us, spoke of the leadership, and said that the leadership would not bring up a proposal to change the rules or would not permit such a proposal to be brought before the Senate. However, I desire to point out that the leadership will do what the majority wants it to do. We can require that. So I absolutely dissent from any such aspersion upon the leadership or upon our ability to control the leadership when we want to.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am sure that the first time a civil rights bill is reported in the next session, it would be put on the calendar.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from New York. I was going to yield to him.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to have the Senator complete his thought.

I should like to sum up the matter by saying, first, that as a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I heard all the witnesses who wanted to be heard in the most comprehensive set of hearings on rule XXII that had been held in years. We then made our report. The facts in that report which bear directly on the issue of two-thirds present and voting are these: Cloture has been applied only 4 times, and all those instances occurred prior to 1949, before the present rule, when the rule was two-thirds of those present and voting. Since 1927, for 32 years, no cloture had been applied. If there had been a rule of a two-thirds constitutional majority, which is in effect today, when those 4 votes were taken on whether cloture should be applied, it would have knocked out only 1 of them, and there still would have been 3. So the proposal by the majority leader—and I say this advisedly—is meaningless. It is not a proposed amendment of rule XXII that means anything.

I believe it would get us much deeper into the morass, for this reason: The Vice President has not made any ruling. The Vice President has not ruled on any point of order. The Vice President has said, with respect to debate on a rule change, that cloture could be applied by a majority, under normal rules of parliamentary procedure. But he has not ruled. On the contrary, he has said he will submit this question to the Senate in due course, when it arises.

I should like to point out what I think is fundamental. The Senate, when it votes on the Anderson motion, is voting on the legal question which would be put before it 2 or 3 weeks from now, when the question might arise on the closing of debate. The resolution of the majority leader puts before the Senate the question whether the rules of the Senate shall be continuing. It is a clear implication that the rule of the Senate adopted by the Senate in that resolution shall be binding on all future Senates. The Senate will at least have an opportunity, if the majority agrees, to make a finding against the view taken by the Vice President. I think the action might be questioned by Senators in the future, but the Senate has an opportunity to make that choice in an effort to do what I consider to be an unconstitutional act, to bind future Senates.

One cannot make a point of order against an unconstitutional act, but every Senator can consult his own conscience as to whether he is going to support or vote for a rule which is unconstitutional.

Therefore, the only opportunity which the whole Senate has to act within the constitutional framework to implement what has been outlined in the advisory opinion of the Presiding Officer, which, in my opinion, is workable, is to vote for the Anderson motion.

On the one hand, we are faced with an attempt to close the door on the constitutional right of every Senate by adopting a meaningless amendment to rule XXII, or to do what should have been done a long time ago—restore to the Senate the right to provide its own procedures.

It has been contended that Pandora's box would be opened and confusion would reign if the Anderson motion were adopted. Over in the other body of Congress, in which I served from 1947 to 1954, this whole job was done in 3 minutes. The House does it every 2 years. Its Members are not mad. They have made it work for decades.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. I think we are losing sight of the issue, and are losing sight of a very important matter. There is no question that if we are going to be fair, the Johnson resolution affords an opportunity for the majority to express its will, because the majority can amend, delete, or modify the resolution in any way it chooses. It can change the cloture formula from two-thirds of those present and voting to a majority, if it has the number of votes to do it. I do not think we ought to confuse the issue. The important point we ought to bear in mind is that the difference between doing it the Anderson way and doing it the Johnson way is that the Johnson way preserves the spirit of the continuity of the rules of the Senate, whereas the Anderson way makes the claim and expresses the philosophy and declares the proposition that each Senate has the right to make its own rules.

The net result can be accomplished by the Johnson route or by the Anderson route. If the Anderson motion should be adopted, the Senate would have agreed to adopt new rules at the beginning of each new Congress. The Senate might decide to adopt all the rules with the exception of rule XXII. Then it would have to adopt or modify rule XXII, if rule XXII as rewritten were acceptable.

I think we would be confusing Members of the Senate if we created the impression that the Johnson resolution would not accord the majority an opportunity to express its view. The Senate can do anything it desires with the resolution, because it serves as a basis for action. The only purpose of the Johnson resolution—though I may be wrong, and I stand corrected if I am—is that it preserves the philosophy of the continuity of the Senate. To my way of thinking, it involves the constitutional question whether the Senate has the right to adopt its own rules under the Constitution of the United States.

One thing that has brought up the question sharply is the fact that we now have admitted the new State of Alaska. Two new Senators have been sent from that State. We are telling these new Senators that they cannot even act on the rules which will guide the Senate until a motion is made to amend a rule adopted by a previous Senate. I think we must emphasize that point. Otherwise we are going to mislead everyone.

The important point is that the end result can be accomplished by either method. If one believes in the continuity of the Senate, let him vote for the Johnson proposal. If one believes that each Senate has the right to make its own rules, let him support the Anderson motion. That is the only issue.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I may say that what the junior Senator from Rhode Island has said in 5 minutes has been more to the point than anything which has been said in all these hours of debate. These are the basic issues. In my opinion these are the issues we are asked to vote on. I think the junior Senator from Rhode Island has expressed it so simply that even the lawyers in the Senate ought to be able to understand the issue. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island has clarified the entire question.

What gives rise to the issue before this body? It was the unconstitutional action the Senate took in 1949. Some of us believe that the action of 1949 was so politically unconscionable and reprehensible that it must be changed because it imposes a straitjacket upon future Members of the Senate.

In 1957 the Presiding Officer told us in his advisory opinion that the rule was unconstitutional, and that this body does have a right, by majority vote, under constitutional mandate, to pass upon the very issue that the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island has so clearly presented to us.

This is the real issue: Let us assume that the Anderson motion will be agreed to. What will happen then? As the able Senator from Rhode Island has said, we would move to the next legislative position. What would that be? Next would be the Johnson resolution. Nevertheless by agreeing to the Anderson motion we would have preserved one thing, namely, the constitutional right of future new Members of the Senate to work their will on the Senate rules. That is all we would do. We would then move to consider the Johnson resolution.

Let us assume that we should lose on the Anderson motion. Let us assume the Johnson resolution will be agreed to. Then the majority will have spoken. But it would not be binding on Members coming into the Senate in 1961. We will have preserved their constitutional right, as so clearly explained by the junior Senator from Rhode Island.

I think I have expressed what I understand to be the position we arrived at in the several conferences we have had on this question. In my opinion the Johnson resolution is designed to wipe out whatever body of precedent exists that the Senate rules are not continuous. I think we have a right to pass upon that issue, and I hope the Senate will vote in favor of the Anderson motion.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, a few moments ago the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] asked me how I voted on the resolution in 1949. I believe I know, because I have been smarting under it ever since.

There are 10 Members now in the Senate who were opposed to the resolution at that time. The able Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]; the junior Senator from New Mexico; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]; the dean of the Senate in terms of years and age but not of service, the able Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]; the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER]; the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON]; and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] are the eight who were present, who actually voted against the resolution. In addition the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs [Mr. MURRAY] was not present but was paired against the resolution and the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] was not present but was paired against it. Those were the 10 Senators against the proposition.

I speak for no one but myself, but that night we learned how this was done. It was by the circulation of a round robin, which pledged other Senators to vote in a certain way if a vote were granted by the Senators from the Deep South. They promised they would do certain things and no other things, and in that way they proceeded to shove this down the throats of Members of the United States Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ANDERSON. I made up my mind that if I ever had a chance to work against such procedure in the Senate of the United States I would do so, and I have done so.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point, because I think the point just made ought to be a part of the record.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator will recall that we could not get to a vote in 1949 until the southern bloc released the Senate so that it could vote, after the signing of the round robin which pledged Senators in advance, guaranteeing that the so-called Wherry resolution would be adopted; is that not the case?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is absolutely the case.

Mr. MORSE. I want to stress it.

Mr. ANDERSON. We could not get to any kind of a vote. Hour after hour new records were being set. Some of us took courses on how to filibuster. One Senator said, "Tilt back and forth." It was said one should not take liquids for 24 hours before starting. We were told to teeter back and forth on our feet, so that the muscles would not get sore. Some others had different devices. We had a whole course on filibustering given to us in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further comment?

Mr. ANDERSON. But the important thing is that nobody in the U.S. Senate could vote on one important thing. No committee could meet. Nobody could do anything until we had a round robin by the Members of the U.S. Senate, surrendering without firing a shot.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. MORSE. I simply want to underwrite that statement. The Senator from New Mexico is correct. We did not get the Wherry resolution on the books until first there was a cloakroom surrender by the majority of the Senate to a minority filibuster threat in the Senate of the United States in 1949. That is why the Senator from Oregon has always said we have to drive the filibuster rule from the floor of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, that explains to me, if it explains to no one else, the attitude I have had from that day to this.

I do not subscribe to everything all of my colleagues subscribe to on the question of cloture, but I believe, as I believed that night, it was an improper surrender.

I have not enjoyed time after time getting on my feet to make this motion. I particularly dislike being in opposition to the majority leader, who has done a magnificient job for my party, and whom I try to follow round after round. However, there are things in one's system one cannot get out.

The night of the round robin was a night long to remember. It was a night we were told, "You will never have a chance to vote on anything until, on your hands and knees, you agree this sort of thing will be done."

Round robins were circulated by which Senators pledged themselves to vote for this one thing and this one thing only, and nothing else would come to the floor of the Senate until that was done. The Senate was tied up for weeks, and could not do a thing until that action was taken. I believed then, and I believe now, that that sort of force should be blocked. I believed then, and I believe now, that the only way to do this is by the motion I have put forward. If I thought there were an easy or simple way to do it, I would have done it long ago, because this has been on my heart steadily from that day on.

What did I say only a short time ago? On June 17, 1957, I was commenting on something the able Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] had said. I agree with much the Senator says and I was in agreement with him at that time. He was making a fine talk. I said:

I would also remind the Senator from Minnesota that when we had a discussion of this matter in the early days of the session, when the question was one of a change in rule XXII, there was considerable discussion about the rules of the Senate and the rights of Senators. At that time I tried to make it clear that that was probably the only chance any Member of the Senate would have at this session to vote in regard to anything even remotely resembling that subject. Since then, a number of months have come and gone; and now it is apparent that my prediction was not too bad.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] said:

Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico was a good prophet.

It did not take much ability to prophesy, because it was easy to know what was going to happen.

I then further said:

I said to the Senators who stood beside me then that we might not have another chance to vote on that subject at this session or, indeed, at any session, until we vote on a proposal to change rule XXII.

Those are the facts of the situation. The then able minority leader, the former Senator from California, Mr. Knowland, in a great display of honesty and integrity, stood up in January 1957, and said, "I think this other thing should be done." He was as honest as could be. He was wrong. There was not a possibility that he could get the matter to the floor. He thought that if he could get 35 Senators with him, the leadership would have to bring the matter to the floor, particularly if the majority and minority leaders were sponsors of it. But he was mistaken. If he had had 90 Senators with him I do not think it would have gotten the matter to the floor.

I remember when we had a "clean politics" bill for consideration at one time. Everybody rushed to be a sponsor. Eighty-eight of the ninety-six Senators sponsored the "clean politics" bill, but the bill never saw the light of day.

I remember once a man in a political convention said to me, "Oh, CLINT, won't you nominate me for the job of Secretary of State? Ninety percent of the delegates are for me, but nobody will nominate me."

When I observed that there were 88 names on the bill, I remarked, "That bill is dead, although it would pass if it ever got to the floor of the Senate. We would have to pass the 'clean politics' bill because so many of us have put our names upon it." The bill never saw the light of day on the floor of the Senate. It is one thing to get a bill reported and something else to get it up for consideration and action.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I say again, I hope nobody will forget that if we do not vote for what is called the Anderson motion we will be through for this session.

Mr. HUMPHREY and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania does not mind, I should like to yield to the Senator from Minnesota. I mentioned the Senator a minute ago.

Mr. HUMPHREY. First, I wish to say to the Senator from New Mexico my inability to be present at the beginning of his remarks was due to the fact that I was engaged on unofficial business of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, at a luncheon for the Finance Minister of Kenya. I had extended the invitation some time ago, and, out of courtesy and respect for a visiting dignitary, I kept that luncheon date.

Mr. ANDERSON. My dear friend from Minnesota never has to explain to me his conduct. I have watched him, and have enjoyed his presence in the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I would have benefitted greatly from what I am sure has been and will continue to be the very brilliant presentation on the part of the Senator from New Mexico.

One of the strange paradoxes of the situation relating to the Senate rules is the fact that the Senator from New Mexico is standing on the floor today defending the great constitutional principle, the Federal principle, the principle of States rights; and some of the advocates of States rights are attempting to destroy it. Let me explain what I mean.

The so-called Connecticut compromise on the Constitution, relating to the large States and the small States involved in the constitutional convention, provided that, regardless of the size of the State or the population of the State, each State should have two Senators, and each Senator should have equal voting rights and equal privileges. Senators who are trying to deny to the U.S. Senate the privilege of exercising its constitutional right of adopting rules are doing so in violation of a fundamental principle of the American Constitution.

I ask my colleagues to bear with me on this point. What right is there on the part of any group in the Senate to deny to 18 newly elected U.S. Senators the opportunity to have something to say about the rules under which they are to participate in the deliberations of this body?

What right has any Senator to say to my distinguished colleague from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], to the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. MUSKIE], the distinguished junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], and other Senators, that we who have been here 2 years, 8 years, 10 years, 15 years, or 20 years before the new Senators arrived have omniscient wisdom to tell them how they are to govern themselves? What right have we to say to them, "You shall have no opportunity whatsoever to express your rights or to utilize your constitutional rights to decide how the procedures of the Senate are to be conducted"?

I say to my colleagues that procedural rights in the Senate are as important as procedural rights in the courts of the United States; and procedural rights in the courts frequently determine whether or not justice will be rendered, whether or not the courts themselves will administer principles of justice.

What we are talking about, and what the Senator from New Mexico is pleading for, is the right of every State to have two Senators to vote upon the rules of the Senate. I do not believe it is fitting and proper for the State of Pennsylvania to have only one Senator with the right to vote upon rules of the Senate. As a matter of fact, the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania has never had an opportunity to vote on the rules which govern the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Very few Senators have had the right to vote on the rules governing the Senate.

While I have all the respect in the world for our predecessors, I do not believe that they were necessarily blessed with the kind of omniscient wisdom which some may feel they presently possess.

The argument of the Senator from New Mexico is the argument of the Founding Fathers of the Constitution. The argument of the Senator from New Mexico is the argument which was fought out in the First and Second Congresses. It is the argument of Thomas Jefferson.

We talk about precedents and rules. For a period of time there was the precedent that the Senate could change its rules on the basis of each new Congress. Then there was a period of time, after the Civil War, when the reconstructionist advocates were in control, when a dominant group in the Senate construed the rules of the Senate to their benefit.

Subsequently, because of the very capable talents and intellectual qualities of some of our brethren from the South and elsewhere, they were able to utilize the rules to dominate the Senate.

All the Senator from New Mexico is saying is that if anyone is to dominate the Senate, it should be the majority of the United States Senators, who are given the opportunity to act upon the body of rules which are to govern the activities of the Senate. Reasonable men know that most of the rules would be reenacted time after time, as is the case in the House of Representatives. That would not mean that we would give up the constitutional right of exercising our responsibility for the conduct of the business of the Senate.

There are Members of this body who have never exercised their constitutional duty—not only their privilege, but their constitutional duty—to decide upon the rules which should govern the procedures of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON. Sixty of them have never had such an opportunity.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. CLARK. A few moments ago the Senator from New Mexico was discussing with great eloquence the situation in 1949, and the difficulty which was then inherent in even having a vote on a motion to change the rules.

Let me ask the Senator whether, if the Johnson resolution were to prevail, we would not be going back substantially to the same cloture rule which existed in 1949, before the fight which the Senator from New Mexico so ably described.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so, with one exception. In the 1949 situation there was no restriction on a motion to take up; and this proposal would provide a restriction on a motion to take up.

Mr. CLARK. If the Johnson resolution is to prevail, will we not be faced, in 1961, with the same unfortunate situation which confronted the Senator from New Mexico in 1949, namely, the inability to obtain any action on the floor without making some deal in the cloakrooms and signing a round robin?

Mr. ANDERSON. That would be the situation unless there should be a Vice President who would rule as the present Vice President has ruled. The Senator from Pennsylvania has had no real opportunity to vote on the rules. His junior colleague from Pennsylvania has now come to the Senate. Pennsylvania is a large and important State, but it has no legal standing in this body when it comes to rules. Its Senators may vote on appropriations and on taxes to provide money for the Treasury, but must not vote on rules.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to a certain portion of Senate Resolution 5, submitted by the majority leader and other Senators, which, when the Senator from New Mexico shall have commented upon it, will appear slightly different than what was just stated in response to the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. ANDERSON. We have been dealing with the "continuous" phase.

Mr. HUMPHREY. This provision was not in the rules of the Senate prior to 1949.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me say further that the very presence in section 3 of the proposed language in subsection 2 indicates to me a doubt in the minds of the authors of the resolution as to whether the rules of the Senate are continuing. I say most emphatically that if the rules of the Senate are continuing, and if everyone is sure that they are continuing, there is no necessity for legislation now.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is a part of the "package" deal.

Mr. HUMPHREY. A part of the "package" deal is that up to date a willful minority in the Senate has been able to impose upon the Senate the misguided theory that the rules of the Senate are continuing. Now that there seems to be the possibility of a majority which may set aside this theory of doubtful validity, the minority is trying to pin it down by tying it into a package relating to the amendment of rule XXII.

We shall argue the merits of the Johnson proposal, which has some very constructive features. I do not wish to be placed in the position of saying that there are not many constructive features in the Johnson proposal, but the Johnson proposal does not get at the heart and core of the principle involved before the U.S. Senate.

I ask every one of my colleagues who has just come to this body, Do you wish to deny yourself the right to have anything to say about the rules of the Senate which shall govern your activities? Are you going to say that, somehow or other, we have a sort of "divine right of kings" in the sense that we can hand down from generation to generation binding rules of procedure, or are you going to exercise your constitutional right—not only a right, but a mandate—to comply with the provision that the Houses of Congress shall——

Mr. HOLLAND. "May."

Mr. HUMPHREY. I accept the correction—the constitutional provision that the Houses of Congress may provide rules for their proceedings? Are the Senators to whom I have alluded going to cast aside that opportunity, or are they going to take advantage of it? It seems to me that that is the issue.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The point I wished to make clear for the record was that if we adopt the Johnson resolution, we will not be better off than in 1949, when the Senator from New Mexico had his difficult time with this subject; instead, we will probably be worse off.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I had not intended to get into this debate. However, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, as I recall, was a Member of the Senate in 1949.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct. I have just testified to that fact.

Mr. RUSSELL. He is an honest man, and I do not believe he will permit the statement to stand that the Senate would be under a more restrictive rule if the Johnson resolution were adopted than we are under the rule adopted in 1949. The Senator from New Mexico well knows that prior to 1949 no cloture petition of any kind could be applied to a motion to proceed to consider a bill. Is that not correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator is correct. I said that a moment ago.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from New Mexico must have said it in a very low tone of voice, and the Senator from Pennsylvania must not have heard it, because the Senator from Pennsylvania has repeated three times that we would be worse off. That is not supported by facts. As the Senator from New Mexico knows, prior to 1949, no cloture petition was applicable to a motion to bring up a bill. We had had this question up in the Senate and had voted on it three or four times. After 1949, a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill was subject to a cloture petition, except in the case of a change in the rules of the Senate. The Johnson resolution proposes to wipe out that latter provision. That is one reason why I am unalterably opposed to the Johnson resolution. There is a glaring difference between the Johnson resolution and what was done in 1949.

The Senator from New Mexico will admit that what I say is true. I hear Senators say on the floor of the Senate that rule XXII is a filibuster rule, that it encourages filibusters. They have convinced members of the press that rule XXII encourages filibusters. There was no restriction on debate of any kind in connection with a motion to bring up a bill until rule XXII was adopted. Instead of the rule encouraging filibusters, the adoption of that rule made it possible to stop filibusters. It is not a rule which encourages filibusters.

It is tragic indeed that history should be so distorted to the effect that rule XXII is a rule which encourages filibusters. The only thing which could be worse than that would be to leave unchallenged and unanswered the repeated statement that the Johnson resolution, if adopted, would throw the Senate into a worse position than it was as a result of the rule fight in 1949.

Mr. ANDERSON. I only wish to say to the distinguished Senator from Georgia that that could be a matter of opinion. The Senator from Georgia thinks it is bad to tie down that portion relating to a motion to take up a bill and make it subject to cloture.

There are those Senators who worry a great deal about the innocent-looking third part, which tries to make the rules continuous. We are afraid that at some later date a Vice President might say: "By the action in 1959, we have said that these rules are continuing rules, and under those rules it is not possible to make a motion to adopt rules de novo." That is what we are trying to do now, adopt rules de novo.

I will say to the Senator from Georgia that while he does not think it is any worse, it is a matter of judgment.

I quite agree that there is value in tightening up the ability to handle a motion on cloture.

In that respect the Johnson resolution is good. I do not believe that there is much difference between two-thirds of those present and voting and two-thirds of those who have been duly chosen Senators.

I should like to quote from an Associated Press dispatch of January 8, 1959, in which the Senator is quoted as follows:

> And he added—
> The Senator from Georgia—
> significantly, that two-thirds of those present and voting is little different from two-thirds of the full membership, because "most members would be present, anyway, on a disputed question."

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. We find one area of agreement.

Mr. RUSSELL. I recall making that statement. I do not recall making it to the Associated Press. I was interviewed by a representative of the United Press and was correctly quoted in the newspapers which carried that interview. Then some of the columnists picked up that statement and twisted it around until I did not recognize my own statement. I am sure my colleagues have had the same experience.

Mr. ANDERSON. Perhaps I had better read the remainder of the statement before the Senator from Georgia leaves the floor. The dispatch continues:

> Senator RUSSELL said that the southerners opposing any change in the rules would not filibuster against a motion to take up JOHNSON'S proposal tomorrow or at any other time.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is that a recent article?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I was wondering. I thought the Senator was referring to something that was said a long time ago.

Mr. ANDERSON. I read further from the AP dispatch of today:

> Asked if the southerners were reconciled to accepting the Johnson proposal, RUSSELL said he and others would oppose it on the merits but he did not expect as many or as long speeches against it as there would have been on ANDERSON'S motion.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not recall that that distinction was drawn.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it not correct to say that some of those in the Senator's group are opposed to it on its merits?

Mr. RUSSELL. To the Johnson proposal?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am unalterably opposed to it. Any rule that gags the representatives of sovereign States from exercising their right to speak in the forum of States does not meet with my approval. What I had in mind was that it was less obnoxious to have two-thirds of those present and voting than to permit a mere majority to gag the representatives of sovereign States in this forum of States. Until recently we considered the Senate to be a great forum of the States, in which Senators serve as ambassadors of their States. It would never meet with my approval to adopt a rule under which a majority could gag their colleagues, even if it were a substantial majority, and deny them a voice on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the Senator from Georgia. He refers to the fact that Senators are regarded as ambassadors from their States. The Senator from Pennsylvania who believes himself to be an ambassador of the State of Pennsylvania thinks he is an ambassador without portfolio, because he cannot vote on the question of rules.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator voted 2 years ago on the question of rules. I am amazed at that statement. We had the question up 4 and 6 years ago. Senators voted for it and they will have another opportunity to vote for it. I do not wish anyone to tell me that Senators have no chance to vote on the rules. The Vice President ruled on that point very clearly 2 years ago. He ruled very clearly as to the effect of the vote. There was not a Member of the Senate who was so stupid that he did not understand that ruling. They all voted on January 4 or 5 of 1957. Prior to that time the Senator from New Mexico had raised the question, in January 1953. The Senate voted on it. Yet he says that the Senator from Pennsylvania is an ambassador without portfolio. I do not know what he means by that. He was certificated. He was sworn in. He has drawn compensation as a Senator. He has been an active and able Senator on the floor and in committee. I do not know where he has lost any portfolio. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has brought my name into the debate.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not bring the Senator's name into the debate.

Mr. CLARK. I am highly honored that he should have brought it in. After a little thought, I am sure he will agree that he did mention me.

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe I did.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to say, in my own defense, that, despite the high regard I have for the views of the able and distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, in all good conscience I must say first that if the Johnson resolution is adopted, the Senate, with respect to being able to defeat a filibuster, will be worse off than it was in 1949 because of section 3 of the resolution, which makes the rules of the Senate continue from one Congress to the next Congress, and therefore freezes the two-thirds cloture rule on any attempt to change the rules. Second, I can say to my good friend that I am perfectly willing to admit that I may be one of the most stupid Members of the Senate, but I do not think I had any chance to vote on the rules 2 years ago.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Pennsylvania did have a chance.

Mr. CLARK. I voted against a motion to table: I never had an opportunity to vote on the rules.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, when we are in the minority, we can always discuss what happened. On several occasions, I have been very badly abused when I said that the Senate had taken foolish action because a majority did not vote as I did. But the Senator was here, and he voted. He voted against tabling the motion of the Senator from New Mexico. Unfortunately, the majority did not agree with him.

Mr. CLARK. I feel no sense of abuse of any sort. I am happy to be a Member of this distinguished body. I glory in the friendship of my good friend from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I reciprocate his compliment.

Mr. CLARK. I still feel that I did not have a chance to vote on the rules 2 years ago.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator did not have an opportunity to vote on a great many matters. There are some 10,000 or 11,000 bills introduced every year. We pass 600 or 700 of them. The Senator did not have an opportunity to vote on 9,000 of them; they never came up. That will always be the case.

The Senator had more opportunity to vote in the case of the proposed rules change than he did on numerous bills that never saw the light of day in committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think every Senator has always benefited from the advice and, I may say most respectfully, of the views of the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, particularly when it comes to the matter of Senate rules.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from Minnesota. I will prepare myself for the shock which I know is coming. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. The senior Senator from Minnesota cannot in any way shock the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia, nor would he want to. He respects the senior Senator from Georgia highly.

I listened to the argument that a representative of a sovereign State should not be gagged or denied the opportunity to participate fully here to protect the interests of his State by any kind of rule of the Senate which would deny him full participation. I believe that is the sum and substance and feeling of many Senators relating to the right of unlimited debate. There is a good argument which can surely be made for that particular case.

But I say in all sincerity that if two-thirds of the Senators are not supposed to be able to shut off debate, according to the views of some, then indeed a majority of the Senators ought not to be able to deny other Senators, who have never had the right or have never been able to exercise the right to formulate their rules, the opportunity to vote on that particular issue.

I submit that in the instance of the Anderson motion in the 85th Congress, the question of rules of the Senate was never before the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Senator. The Senator from New Mexico moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a motion to adopt rules for the Senate. At that point a motion was made to table, and Senators were asked to vote either to table the motion or to continue the debate. As a result, a majority of the Senators in that instance said that they were not going to permit other Senators even to have the privilege of taking up the consideration of the preparation of rules of the Senate which would have something to say about the conduct of proceedings in this body.

There may be Senators who will be able to go home to their constituents and say, "Thanks for electing me. Thanks for all the things you have been able to do for me. But when I got to the U.S. Senate, I simply decided that I did not have any views on how the Senate should be conducted. I decided I would rely upon my great, great grandfather or somebody else's great, great grandfather to determine how we would proceed to conduct the affairs of the Senate. So I forfeited for my particular State a right I have under the Constitution to say something about the rules of conduct in the Senate."

Senators can do that. It has been done again and again; Senators have said that they were so unconcerned about the rules of procedure in this body that they would not exercise the right which article I, section 5, of the Constitution gives to them, if they wish to exercise it.

All the Senator from New Mexico is attempting to do is to provide, in the name of States rights and in the name of the Constitution of the United States, that when a Senator is elected—and there are only two Senators from each State, regardless of the size or population of the State—when he takes his oath of office, before he is asked to serve on a committee, before he is asked to debate a bill, before he is asked to cast a vote on a substantive measure, that Senator from a sovereign State having equal rights and equal responsibilities in the Federal Union, shall have the right or shall exercise the right of prescribing rules of procedure for this body.

It is one thing to have a rule in substance. We can disagree about rules. I have said to the distinguished majority leader that I am not merely so much concerned about the arithmetic—whether the majority be two-thirds, three-fifths, or a simple majority—as I am about the principle of the right of every U.S. Senator to have something to say about the rules under which he will live.

If Senators will insist upon having a vote on the rules under which their constituents shall live, they will insist that they will always exercise the right to repeal laws without any interference, on the basis of a majority vote, and to write new laws relating to every man, woman, and child in the United States and in the Territories thereof on the basis of a majority vote. The Supreme Court has ruled, again and again, that one legislative body cannot bind another on the basis of the substance of their legislative proposals.

This is not a personal matter. We are not here as Mr. CLARK or Mr. ANDERSON or Mr. HUMPHREY. We are not here in that capacity. We are here as two United States Senators, a senior Senator and a junior Senator, from each State. When we deny our States the right to have something to say about the procedure of this body, which determines the laws of the land, I ask whether we have fulfilled our obligations to the States which we represent. There are Senators of the United States in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield to me for a moment, I may say that I always find my delightful friend from Minnesota most plausible. No one who has known him for as much as 5 minutes could suspect that he is ever at a loss for words. It is easy for me to understand how Mr. Khrushchev asked the senior Senator from Minnesota one question, and then for 8 hours heard a lot of good, democratic, capitalistic doctrine. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I should like to insert another pleasantry. Someone wanted to know how it was that Mao Tse-tung decided to drop out as leader of the Chinese people. It was because he found out that he was next on Senator HUMPHREY'S calling list. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may say most respectfully that the only other two countries in the world besides the United States which still respect this rather, what I would call, shadow of a filibuster happen to be the Communist Republic of China and the Soviet Union. I should like to extricate myself from those surroundings.

Mr. RUSSELL. I know the Senator is an expert on Russia, but he would be hard put to prove that Mr. Khrushchev would permit a filibuster in the Presidium of the Soviet Union.

I wonder how we are going to conduct the business of the Senate if we carry out the thesis of the Senator from Minnesota that every Senator has the right to review every rule when he comes into this body. Would the Senator from Minnesota discriminate against a Senator who became a Member later? Would such a Senator have the right, under that construction of the Constitution, to rise and say: "I move that we proceed to consider the rules of the Senate, because I have not been able to participate in the making of these rules"?

For 169 years the Senate of the United States has served the people of the Nation without this issue having been raised at all. Great men have come here. Of course, I realize that we say the whithering hands of men dead and gone shall not bind us. But great men have come into the Senate under the rules. They did not feel they were being penalized because they could not get up on the first day of a session and say: "I have to pass on these rules" in this unusual manner.

At the last session the Senate selected five great Senators and ordered their portraits hung in the anteroom. They were great Senators. All of them came to the Senate and accepted the situation as they found it. They served their people, their country, and humanity well. They departed and joined the ranks of those dead men who are now spoken of so disparagingly. They never felt that they had been penalized because they had not, on the first day of every new Congress, had a chance to express themselves on rule I, rule II, rule III, and on on down to rule XL.

I do not think any present Senator has lost anything because of it, for he has a right to bring up a proposal to change the rules in the method prescribed by the rules. Many former Senators, almost as able as some of our colleagues today, have served under those conditions without feeling that they were penalized because at the beginning of a session they could not change the rules.

Senators have referred to the Supreme Court. Of late I have not been able to keep up with the Supreme Court; but I know that in the case of McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U.S. 135), the Supreme Court took the position that the Senate was a continuing body.

We know that the Constitution provides for three classes of Senators. Yesterday, we saw the two Senators from Alaska draw, in order to be placed in two of those classes. The purpose of the constitutional provision for three classes of Senators is to have the Senate continue from Congress to Congress; and the two-thirds of the membership who continue from one Congress to another are replenished or added to by the one-third who are elected. Similarly, we know that the Vice President of the United States is not elected for a 2-year term. Instead, he is elected for a 4-year term; and he presides over a continuing body.

The Senator from Minnesota himself invoked the ruling by the Presiding Officer to which I have referred, when he said the vote would be on the rules of the Senate. I relied on that in my statement about the Senator from Pennsylvania. At that time the Senator from Minnesota was congratulated by all his colleagues who were associated with him in the drive to remake the rules and to impose gag rule by a majority of Senators, because he had gotten that ruling from the Vice President. I thought he would be proud of it for 2 years more, and would not be discouraged about it or would not forget it.

I did not agree with the Vice President. From time to time I have tried to make it clear that I do not wholeheartedly embrace his views in this field. But he stated the ruling that was invoked by the Senator from Minnesota—namely, that—

> At the beginning of a session in a newly elected Congress, the Senate can indicate its will in regard to its rules in one of three ways:
> First. It can proceed to conduct its business under the Senate rules which were in effect in the previous Congress and thereby indicate by acquiescence that those rules continue in effect. This has been the practice in the past.
> Second. It can vote negatively when a motion is made to adopt new rules and by such action indicate approval of the previous rules.
> Third. It can vote affirmatively to proceed with the adoption of new rules.

After that ruling, the Senate proceeded to vote.

After the Senator from Minnesota evoked that ruling by the Presiding Officer, I assumed he would agree that in 1957 the Senate did vote on something having to do with the rules—just as the Senate will vote today or tomorrow on that issue.

Mr. President, I do not wish to delay. The Senator from New Mexico has been more than generous in yielding. I had hoped to have a few minutes on my own time to discuss some phases of this matter. I shall not impose further on the time of the Senator from New Mexico, but shall strive to obtain about 15 minutes later to discuss briefly the argument that, because some of these rules were brought forth by Senators who now are dead, we should not consider them valid, but should proceed to change and to alter them.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the decision the able and distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] mentioned a moment ago. I obtain a good deal of consolation from this debate, because last summer we had a debate in which some of us expressed our disapproval of certain decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States; and although the Senator from New Mexico did not participate in that debate some of our colleagues who now are aiding and abetting him in the presentation of his proposal took us to task for not making complete obeisance to the decisions of the Supreme Court I am afraid that at that time we set a precedent which they are now following.

In the case of McGrain against Daugherty, which is reported in volume 273 of the Reports of the U.S. Supreme Court, a Senate investigating committee tried to get Mally S. Daugherty, a brother of the then former Attorney General to come before it and testify. He refused to do so. An election came along; and a new House of Representatives was elected, and one-third of the Members of the Senate were elected; and the old Congress died, and a new Congress came into being. The President of the Senate issued an order for the arrest of Daugherty; and he was arrested by the Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. Daugherty then went into the Federal District Court and applied for a decree for his release, upon the allegation that since the Congress at which the Senate committee authorizing the investigation had been created had terminated, the Senate committee had lost its power to act in any parliamentary manner. The district court adopted the theory now held by some of the Members of the Senate—other than the Senator from New Mexico—who are indicating their approval of the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

So there was squarely presented the question of whether parliamentary proceedings of the Senate in a previous Congress still had legal force and effect. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decree of the district court releasing Daugherty upon this reasoning:

> Another question has arisen which should be noticed. It is whether the case has become moot. The investigation was ordered and the committee appointed during the 68th Congress. That Congress expired March 4, 1925.

Then the Court set out the position of the arrested party, to the effect that the power of both the House and the Senate to exercise parliamentary functions after that Congress had gone out of existence had ceased, and cited the rule to that effect which had been held in England with reference to the British Parliament.

But the Court rejected this position, saying:

> The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

There was a square decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1926; the decision was to the effect that the Senate is a continuing body, a body which never goes out of existence. Furthermore, the Constitution provides in express terms that the Senate may adopt rules to govern its proceedings.

But here a very ridiculous constitutional position is taken, namely, that a body which is continuous in its existence, a body which never dies, a body which always remains in being, and which is declared by the Supreme Court to be a continuing body, cannot adopt continuous rules. To my mind, from the standpoint of constitutional law, that is an absurd position to take.

I wish to say another word: At the last session we authorized the publication of a manual on Senate procedure which had been prepared by our very able Parliamentarian and our very able assistant Parliamentarian. On page 544 of that book, which was approved by the Senate when the Senate authorized its publication, we are told that the standing rules of the Senate may be amended by a majority vote.

So there is nothing here to deprive the majority of the Senate of the right to make rules. They can be changed. But since 1789 the Senate has always considered that its rules continued, just like the Senate continued, from Congress to Congress.

That has been the rule since 1789—that a continuous body can adopt rules which are continuous. Otherwise it is no continuous body.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I do not have the floor. The Senator from New Mexico has kindly yielded to me.

Mr. EASTLAND. Will the Senator from New Mexico permit me to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do. I took a pledge that I would not yield further, but would surrender the floor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Mississippi to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is it not true that the Constitutional Convention had 55 delegates? Nineteen of those 55 delegates came to the Senate of the United States. They helped organize the first Senate. They helped write the rules of the Senate. They recognized at all times that the Senate was a continuing body, and that its rules would stand. What better proof would one want than from the men who framed the Constitution and who came to the Senate and who established it as a continuing body?

Mr. ERVIN. That is enough proof for me. In addition, we have the further fact that only four times in 169 years have general revisions of the Senate rules been made.

Some persons say that the men who wrote the rules of the Senate are dead. I do not know how far they want to carry that argument. The prophet Moses is dead. He brought the Ten Commandments down from Mount Sinai. Moses is dead. Are the Ten Commandments, therefore, no longer binding? Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the Declaration of Independence, is dead, too. Does that fact destroy the value of the Declaration of Independence? George Washington, who presided over the Constitutional Convention, is dead. James Madison, the father of the Constitution, James Wilson, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, and all those other great men who sat in the Constitutional Convention are dead.

Does this fact destroy the value of the Constitution?

Be this as it may, we are told that we ought now to ignore all the rules of the Senate written by men who served in the Senate and knew how it operated in times past, and proceed to rewrite all of them anew. I respectfully submit that wisdom requires that we regard the rules of the Senate as continuing in being until they are amended as they have been regarded for 169 years, and that we proceed to consider repealing or changing such rules only as we consider them inadvisable. We are told that the men who have been recently admitted from the new State of Alaska and other new Members from the other States ought to be permitted to write the rules of the Senate. I doubt seriously whether these men who have had no experience in the Senate, would like to take that responsibility.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. EASTLAND. Does the distinguished Senator from North Carolina realize that George Mason refused to sign the draft of the Constitution, and that his reason was that the United States Senate was a constant, existing body, and that therefore it destroyed the balance of power in the Government? That is the reason he assigned for not signing the draft of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ERVIN. That is correct, but George Mason is dead, too.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the joint committee appointed by the Senate and the House of Representatives yesterday to notify the President that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and are ready to receive any communication he may desire to make, have performed that duty, and now report that in the Hall of the House of Representatives the President will submit in person his annual message to the two Houses at 12:30 o'clock tomorrow, January 9, 1959.

I should like Senators to be informed that we expect to assemble and march to the House of Representatives about 12:10. I would like all Members to be on notice that we shall precede our leaving the Chamber with a rollcall.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I desire to yield the floor. I know there are Members of the Senate who desire to speak on the subject. Therefore, out of a desire to accommodate those who wish to speak, I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not know how many more speakers desire to address themselves to the Anderson motion before we make a motion to table. I hope we shall be able to do that sometime between 4 and 5 o'clock. If we could do it by that time, I would like to accommodate all Senators who desire to speak, and notify those who are absent that we would expect a tabling motion at about that hour. There is a dinner being held this evening for the minority leader. We have other meetings. We hope all Senators may be notified when we do have the vote on the tabling motion. I should like to inquire if there are any Senators on the floor who desire to address themselves to the Anderson motion, and, if so, how much time they desire.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I would expect to speak for no more than 30 minutes. I will do my best to make it 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to speak?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If time permits—and I do not intend to delay the vote of the Senate by speaking—I should like to be recognized for a period of not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to speak?

Mr. MORSE. I indicated earlier today I intended to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would the Senator care to indicate how much time he desires?

Mr. MORSE. It will be at some length.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to inform Senators I have no desire to seek recognition to make a motion to table, which is not debatable, but I do plan to do that. I want to give Senators as good an indication as I can as to what time that motion may be made, so they will know when there will be a vote and come back to the Chamber.

Mr. MORSE. I suppose the Senator from Oregon and the majority leader have an understanding that the Senator from Texas is always free to exercise whatever parliamentary rights he is entitled to. The Senator from Oregon was on his feet at the time of adjournment yesterday. He has been trying to discuss the subject on its merits. I am interested in the question of what free debate exists. Of course, the majority leader can cut debate off by a motion to table. I shall wait with interest to see what happens.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas intends to make the motion, if he can obtain the floor. He thinks the Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois have been cooperative. We knew we could not have a vote before 4 o'clock. If the Senator from Oregon would care to have an additional hour, hour and a half, or 2 hours, I could tell Senators they could not expect a vote before 6 or 7 o'clock. I have no particular choice of a time, except to try to inform Senators so they can come to the Chamber. The motion will be a motion to table. If it prevails, then we can expect debate on the merits of the resolution or on amendments. In view of the arrangements which have been made and worked out, and the fact that a motion to table is not debatable, I think, in fairness to the other Members of the Senate, we ought to give them as good an indication as we can of the time of the motion. If the Senator from Oregon cares to speak at some length, say 2 hours, I could give them information about going to dinner, and we would withhold a vote until the Senator had concluded.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. On a matter that I consider to be of such great importance to the country as this particular matter is, the Senator from Oregon is never going to pledge himself to limit debate. I do not know how long the debate will take, in view of the colloquies my discussion may arouse on the floor of the Senate. All I can say is that I intend to speak at some length. If the Senate majority leader proposes to cut off this debate today, because there is something about today which is of such special importance we ought to end the debate today, by exercising his right to make a motion to table, he certainly has the right to do that, but I serve notice on the majority leader that I am not going to commit myself to any time limitation in this debate, and I am also going to serve notice that if I get the floor in my own right I shall speak at some length.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon not only serves notice on the majority leader, but he serves notice on all Senators that he is going to speak at some length and he does not care to indicate how great the length will be. We are all aware that the Senator holds one of the all-time records for speaking at length in this body. The Senator may desire to establish another record while we are on this matter. I will inform Senators that they leave here at their own peril.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to take a modest period of time to discuss the pending motion, the Anderson motion.

Mr. President, may we have order? It is not easy for me to speak or for others to hear.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber, please. The Senator from New York will suspend until the Senate is in order.

The Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think the first thing which is very important in this debate is to ascertain the critical character of the vote which will be cast on the Anderson motion. I think there is a feeling in the Chamber, which is unwarranted by the facts, that this is merely one of those interim votes which Senators will have a chance to repair, if they do not like the result, in the course of other votes which may be cast.

That is not my opinion, Mr. President. On the contrary, I think this is the decisive vote on the whole question of whether we shall or shall not have an amelioration of rule XXII.

I say that this is the decisive vote advisedly, Mr. President, because I believe the advisory opinion of the Vice President, the Presiding Officer of this body, has set it up that way.

The Vice President has said, in practical effect, that he will submit to the Senate the fundamental question of whether the rules made by one Senate can bind a new Senate in a new Congress. The Vice President has, in his advisory opinion, stated his beliefs. But, Mr. President, it is a question a majority of the Senate will finally decide.

It seems to me that in voting upon the Anderson motion, if we have an opportunity to do so, the Senate will be deciding the question in the affirmative, exactly as the Vice President has outlined it. On the other hand, if the Senate takes the contrary view, it will be making at least its own precedent that it takes a view different from that outlined by the Vice President.

That is why, Mr. President, I think the decision upon the Anderson motion is very important. I know there has been an enormous amount of discussion in the country in the course of the last campaign, and before and since, as to the attitude of individual Senators upon the question of a rules change. I think it is only fair to look these facts clearly in the face now and to realize that the vote upon the Anderson motion will be the determinative vote in respect to the performance of pledges which deal with a meaningful change in the rules.

I should like to repeat that statement, because I believe it is very important. I think it should be clear that the vote on the Anderson motion will be the decisive vote as to whether a meaningful change in the rules will be made.

Why do I say that? It is easy in the course of a debate, when Senators wish the other Members to take a particular point of view, to make everything sound mild and pleasant and not barbed and difficult. I point out to my colleagues that it has been said here, very smoothly and calmly, that if we go to work on the Johnson resolution the Senate can work its will and have any kind of an amendment to rule XXII it wishes.

But what is so critically important in this whole debate is not said. True, the Senate by a majority at any time can work its will on any piece of legislation, including a change in the rules, but the question is, What does it take to get to the point where the majority can manifest its will? Question: What does it take to get to the point where the majority can manifest its will?

Are we to have an insuperable obstacle in the form of rule XXII, even with the change the majority leader proposes, or are we to go directly at the matter in terms of the Constitution of the United States? This is the fundamental issue in the Anderson motion. Are we going to follow the Constitution of the United States or are we going to follow a rule made by one Senate for all succeeding time, to bind all Senates? In other words, are we going to try to give ourselves an extraconstitutional power or are we going to obey the Constitution?

In that regard, my colleagues, there is no court. In that regard the Presiding Officer cannot rule for us. The Presiding Officer cannot sustain a point of order to any part of any motion or resolution on the ground it is unconstitutional. That is for us to decide. The Presiding Officer can only give us his advice; he can go no further. We must decide in our own consciences whether we are going with the Constitution or whether we are not.

I think that is the fundamental issue involved in the Anderson motion. If we needed any confirmation of that fact, if we needed anything to keep us from being "taken in" by the idea that we can go to work on the Johnson resolution—and I believe we would be "taken in" if we did not agree to the Anderson motion, or at least we would be "taken in" if we did not have our eyes open and did not vote as we should—we had the "tipoff" yesterday by the action of my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], for when the majority leader asked unanimous consent to present his resolution for immediate consideration, instead of having it put over for a day—and I was quite prepared to go along with that, then being on my feet reserving the right to object—the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] served notice on all of us that if the unanimous consent were granted he would use it as a reason why a point of order could not be made against the resolution and for any other purposes he thought he could use it to advantage.

That indicated something which is very important to those who may have some doubt about whether to vote for the Anderson motion. It indicated that once we are "taken in" the rule book will be thrown at us and every advantage which would derive from the adoption of the Johnson resolution, whether the majority leader contemplates it or not—I will give the majority leader all the credit in the world for good faith—can nevertheless be utilized by any other Member of this body. The majority leader cannot control that. Even in the debate on his own resolution, regardless of how the Senator may desire to bring the matter to a vote, if we defeat the Anderson motion we will give a tremendous edge to those who will then claim in this body that by having defeated the Anderson motion we have endorsed the position that cloture must be imposed against a filibuster on the Johnson resolution under the very rules which we are now debating.

Therefore, my friends will see that the Johnson motion itself seeks to get away from the rules but it cannot, whereas the Anderson motion does get away from the rules for the purpose of enabling the Senate to work its will. Indeed, this is the only way in which it can be done.

We are asked another question. Why do we not move to strike the objectionable material from the Johnson resolution? Why is that not a perfectly adequate course of procedure? Why do we have to agree to the Anderson motion? My answer is that if we seek to do it that way we quite literally beg the question because we may find ourselves up against an extended debate or a filibuster in that very effort, and by a vote against the Anderson motion we will have confirmed those who allege that rule XXII in all its phases persists because we have turned down the opportunity given the Senate by the Anderson resolution, to say it does not persist.

I make this point with all deference to the Vice President of the United States, who presides over this body. He is only one man. He has given his advice. He has told us what he thinks. That does not control the majority. The majority will have to make up its mind. In my opinion, once the majority is committed against the Anderson resolution, we can count on the fact that every effort will be made to convince the majority that it is also committed to applying rule XXII, in all its aspects, to the debate on the Johnson resolution. By voting for the Anderson motion we avoid all that, and we are able to carry out in practice exactly the course of procedure which the Vice President, in his advisory opinion, has outlined.

In short, the Anderson motion takes the Vice President at his word in his advisory opinion. It says, in practical effect, that the rules continue until changed; but once the engine of change is set in motion, then the Constitution applies.

It has been said that if the Constitution applies, we are left up in the air with respect to rules and procedure. That argument, in my opinion, is specious, for this reason: The Constitution provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. At the time the Constitution was written—and in that respect it remains unchanged—there were no rules of the Senate. In short, the body which would adopt its own rules had to proceed under normal parliamentary rules, whatever they were at that time. In this body there are normal parliamentary rules. For example, the session opens with a prayer, and the roll is called after Senators are sworn in. This is not according to any specific set of rules, but it represents what Vice President Barkley called a few years ago, when ruling on exactly the same kind of situation, the inherent right of a constitutional body to organize.

If we have any doubts, we have Jefferson's Manual, which gives us guides in terms of the fundamental rules of parliamentary procedure, which we can follow in the absence of a codified set of rules.

The codification of rules is our act. The codification of rules should be the act of no other body; and the codification of rules is permitted by the Constitution itself. Therefore, when we proceed to codify our rules under the Constitution, we are guided by a body of parliamentary precedent which is full and effective, in terms of all our needs.

If we need any further proof of that, the point has been made time and again that the House of Representatives complies exactly with the Constitution. At the beginning of every Congress there are no rules of any kind except general parliamentary law; but the House does its business very efficiently and promptly. There is no gag rule, and no capability for closing debate except under general parliamentary rules. The rules of the House end with the end of every Congress, and at the beginning of the next Congress they are established all over again. That is the position which we take.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Is the Senator aware of any State legislative body in the American Union, either upper house or lower house, where the theory of a continuing body is applied?

Mr. JAVITS. So far as I know—and we analyzed all precedents—we have been unable to find a State senate which takes such a position. In nearly every instance there are specific rules for closing off debate by majority action—some by moving the previous question, and some in other ways. The entire chronology is referred to in the report which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and I made, and in the body of evidence taken before our subcommittee.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The able Senator from New York makes a very important point. I wish to see if I understand it.

Let us assume that the Anderson motion prevails. What will then be the pending business before the Senate?

Mr. JAVITS. The pending business before the Senate will be the adoption of rules for the Senate.

Mr. CARROLL. Let us assume that the Johnson resolution should be the pending business before the Senate; also let us assume that the Anderson motion prevails. Will the Johnson resolution then be subject to rule XXII, or will it be subject to the opinion given by the Vice President?

Mr. JAVITS. That would depend—and that is the whole burden of my argument—on the action of the majority of this body. The Vice President says he will submit that question at the appropriate time, but he gives us his advice as to how he thinks it should be decided.

What I am pointing out is, first, that the "appropriate time" may not come. Second, it may come at a time when our resolution has been completely dissolved by time and discussion, which pull the thread of the argument completely apart, whereas, on the Anderson motion, the Senate would be making its decision clean cut, to follow the Vice President's advisory views, given an opportunity to do so by the Anderson motion, and to proceed from that point to deal with its own rules, uninhibited by the fact that rule XXII is in the existing rules. That, as I see it, is the only clean and direct way in which Senators who wish to vote that way can manifest their will.

Mr. CARROLL. Let me see if I correctly understand the position of the Senator from New York. If the Senate sustains the Anderson motion, it then proceeds by majority rule.

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. CARROLL. If the Anderson motion is defeated, in all probability the Senate will be operating under rule XXII, which contains severe restrictions on cloture.

Mr. JAVITS. At least we would deprive ourselves of the opportunity of saying that the way we want to operate is by majority rule, and we would leave the question open until some later time, when it could come up for decision, first by the Vice President, and then by the Senate. By that time our resolution may be dissolved, and the whole argument may be so threadbare and pulled apart that no one will recognize it.

The Anderson motion is clear and precise. The majority would exercise its determination that debate can be closed by majority vote, once the Anderson motion is adopted. As I see it, that is the only clean and precise way in which the object can be achieved.

That is my reason for saying that Senators who have made pledges or campaign promises, or have otherwise given assurances to their constituents can, by a decisive vote on the Anderson motion, manifest a basic position, a position which they have taken before the country, that position being that a majority can prevent a filibuster in connection with a rule change at the beginning of a Congress. That is what it comes down to. An affirmative vote on the Anderson motion is the clean, direct, and immediate way in which that position can be manifested.

Mr. CARROLL. I think that is a very important point.

Let us assume that the Anderson motion is voted down. Then clearly the pending business will be the Johnson resolution. Will not the Johnson resolution, as the pending business, be subject to rule XXII?

Mr. JAVITS. The Vice President says in his advisory opinion that it would not be, but the Senate must decide that question. The circumstances, the time, and the conditions under which it will decide it, no one knows. What I am pointing out is that under the Anderson motion the Senate would have the opportunity to decide the question then and there, and to know where it was going. It is vitally important that we all know that we are to have such opportunity.

As we all know, often it is not the fact that a filibuster is in progress, but the fact that a filibuster is overhanging the situation, which conditions the kind of legislation we pass. The only way for the Senate to give itself a clear shot at making rule XXII what it wants to make it is by adopting the Anderson motion. Otherwise we proceed under the Johnson resolution. I cited what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] said yesterday. We might be thwarted or compelled to accept some undesirable compromise in order to get what we can and run.

If we vote for the Anderson motion we end that threat. The threat of a filibuster is removed. A majority has the capability not only for voting a rule change, but also for knowing that it will have the opportunity to vote. The Anderson proposal is the only way of insuring such opportunity.

All the argument to the effect that the majority can change the rules at any time is so much dust thrown in the eyes of those who wish to reach the end of the rule XXII question. The dust arises because of the fact that the question is not whether a majority can vote a change—there is no question about that; it can vote a change at any time—but a question of when the majority can reach a vote. The only clear way to settle that question is to settle it now, by an affirmative vote on the Anderson motion. Then the majority will know that they will not only be entitled to vote but that they can get a vote whenever they consider the debate to have gone on long enough.

Mr. CARROLL. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. That is the issue. Let us not kid ourselves about it or be confused. Whatever Members choose to do, is there own judgment, but they should realize that this is the decisive question and that it is being decided on the Anderson motion. I am very grateful that, notwithstanding all the sound and fury of yesterday and today, we shall have a clear opportunity to vote yea or nay on this question whenever the majority leader makes his motion to table. That is the decisive vote. That is the vote that ought to go on the records. That is the vote that ought to go in the rule books. That is the vote that should be cited in the arguments. If I have done nothing else in my brief discussion this afternoon but to point out the fact that this is the decisive vote, I shall be well satisfied by what I have done today.

The next question is, What is so important about the proposed change of rule XXII? Why is it so vital? An examination of all the efforts which have been made to protect the filibuster will show why it is so vital. In the first place, until some of our colleagues realized that there would have to be some kind of civil rights bill in 1957, the prospect was that the debate would be protracted or difficult. Except for the civil rights bill, rule XXII would have been quickly amended, and we would have had a better civil rights bill in 1957. The fact that the threat of a filibuster overhung Members of the Senate resulted in many compromises, the principal one being the excising, by a relatively close vote, of the so-called part 3 of the civil rights bill.

We have now found, much to our national difficulty, that the absence of part 3, which deprives the Attorney General of the right to initiate civil proceedings in courts to deal with questions in connection with desegregation of public schools and in other fields, has brought us into great national difficulty, as shown by Little Rock and by the closing of schools in Virginia and in other States, and has created a great situation of tension, because it is hard for moderates in the South to feel other than that they do not have adequate backing. So, therefore, I say we ought to profit by experience.

I realize that filibusters have not only prevented civil rights legislation, but they have also thwarted the enactment of all kinds of other legislation, as a mere reading of a list of such proposed legislation will show. Successful filibusters were conducted in 18 out of 22 efforts. Eighteen is a very large number out of 22. Filibusters have succeeded in thwarting legislation dealing with officers of World War I, the Colorado River development, the Banking Act, the British Loan, Public Housing, and other measures. That gives a concept of the fact that we are dealing with the basic climate in which legislation shall be passed. It is a question whether that climate shall be dominated by a section or whether it shall be free of such shackles. That is the fundamental issue which confronts the Senate. We have an historic opportunity to decide that issue, and I hope we will not forego that opportunity.

Mr. President, I hazard a guess and I make a prediction. I say that, unless we act meaningfully—and I shall come to that in a moment, and then I shall conclude—unless we act meaningfully on rule XXII, the shadow of the threat of the filibuster will overhang and condition every measure in this body, as it has for years. I thoroughly agree with my colleague from Pennsylvania that in this space age we must spring these shackles.

Finally, as to the meaningless change which is proposed by the majority leader, I said before and I repeat that the figures are most eloquent. The last successful cloture motion was decided on February 15, 1927, nearly 32 years ago. The rules of the Senate then permitted cloture by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, which is exactly the kind of proposal made to us by the majority leader. For 32 years since that time there has been no successful cloture motion.

That is true notwithstanding the fact that even a 60 percent rule would have imposed cloture, even on civil rights bills. As late as July 12, 1950, even a 60 percent rule would have done that. However, we were not permitted to do it. On July 12, 1950, there were 55 votes against 33 votes to enforce cloture on a fair employment practice bill. I voted in favor of that bill in the other body. The bill fell by the wayside in the Senate, notwithstanding the fact that 55 Members wanted it passed, because a determined 33 Senators said, "You shall not pass it."

Mr. President, this is an extraconstitutional power which we cannot tolerate in this day and age. The change which is proposed by the majority leader is not even a sop; it is absolutely meaningless, and is intended to divert us from the fundamental purposes involved.

There are not many Members present in the Chamber at the moment. However, there are certain human values involved. There are certain things we must express. Do we wish to manage our own destiny or not? Are we going to do meaningless things when we are able to bring about some real change? Are we going to do a meaningless thing, which will be put forth as a rule change, when all intelligent men must know that it is meaningless?

I hope the Senate will not debase its own high character by doing a meaningless thing. It would be much better to table both proposals than to adopt the Johnson resolution as an effort to do anything meaningful about the situation. It would be better to do nothing than to do something to which Senators could not point as being a realistic effort to change rule XXII so as to stop filibusters. That would be worse than nothing, and an affront to our own character.

I conclude as I began, by emphasizing the importance of the vote on the Anderson motion. I emphasize it. This is the pay-off in this controversy. The vote on the Anderson motion will determine whether the Senate can work its will in a meaningful way. If the Anderson motion is turned down, the result will be a weak and completely inadequate solution of this whole controversy.

This is the first time a Senate committee—by a vote of 5 to 4, it is true, but still by a vote of a Senate committee, the Committee on Rules and Administration—has reported a meaningful resolution to change rule XXII. This is the first time that it has been done in conjunction with and immediately following—or relatively immediately following—a vote on the floor of the Senate. When we have the benefit of all the hearings, the benefit of all the consideration, and the benefit of the determination of a majority of the committee, if we kick that away at this time, a historic opportunity will be missed to do something which is meaningful.

We will miss the opportunity of doing something which will better equip the Senate and better equip our country in terms of the danger of complete extinction which faces our Nation and the rest of the free world.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I wish to commend the very able Senator from New York for his clear and penetrating analysis of the important issue before us. I desire to associate myself with his remarks. We have worked together, not only in the Senate, but also in the House of Representatives, particularly in connection with proposed FEPC legislation. He has cited for the record accurately what happened and what is happening again. I wish to join him in what he has said on the Anderson motion.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Colorado. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I congratulate my good friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], for the very clear exposition which he has made of the points at issue.

I shall try to speak briefly, but I shall try to make clear why we believed the Anderson motion is essential.

We are sometimes asked, "Why is it that you insist upon taking the Anderson route rather than the Johnson route? Why is it that you are first seeking to establish the right of the Senate to adopt rules rather than to move directly into the question of a new rule XXII?"

I think the reason should now be quite clear to the Members of the Senate, but it is probably not very clear to the people of the Nation. In the few minutes I shall take, I should like to make those reasons clear.

We are afraid that unless we pass the Anderson motion, once we start to debate a substantive proposal for a change in rule XXII, by indirection, by acquiescence, or by rule, we will be held to operate under the existing rule XXII.

Section 3 of the existing rule XXII, as all Senators know, but as few of the people in the Nation know, provides that there can be no cloture or limitation of debate on any motion to consider a change in the rules; that so long as one man can hold the floor and keep on talking, or so long as a small group of Senators can hold the floor and keep on talking, it will be impossible for the rest of the Senate to bring the question of a change in the rules to a vote; and, therefore, although we may have the legal right, as the Senator from Wyoming emphasized this afternoon, for a majority, once the vote is ordered, to make a change in the rules, still, as a practical matter, we will never, as the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] has pointed out, be able to bring a substantive change in the rules to a vote, so long as a small group of determined men are able to talk the proposal to death.

Furthermore, under section 2 of existing rule XXII, after the proposed rule change is made the pending business before the Senate it cannot be brought to a vote as long as 33 Senators resist it by prolonged debate and vote against cloture, or are absent on such a vote. Under that section of the existing rule XXII also, therefore, a majority of the Senate could not reach a vote on a rule change.

What we are afraid of is that by acquiescence or otherwise we may, somewhere along the route, be construed as having accepted the existing rules of the Senate and will be governed by section 3 and section 2 of rule XXII and, therefore, in effect, effectively stopped from proposing or carrying through any substantive change in the rules.

Underneath all the verbiage, underneath all the parliamentary maneuvers, is that fact. We are trying to establish at the very beginning of the Senate the right of the Senate, by a majority vote, to adopt rules, and not to be governed by the straitjacket which was imposed in 1949.

Section 2 of rule XXII is bad enough. It provides that cloture or limitation of debate on a bill can be carried through only by a two-thirds vote of the entire membership of the Senate. That really imprisoned a number of bills, including those relating to civil rights, in a cell very difficult for the public to locate, or even to unlock. It put them in a straitjacket and guaranteed that they would not be released from that straitjacket unless so greatly weakened as not to give serious offense to the minority who threatened a filibuster.

But the third section of rule XXII threw away the key to the straitjacket, because it provided that even though a large group in the Senate—even though two-thirds, three-fourths, three-fifths, or five-sixths—were determined to change the rules, they could not do so because unanimous consent was needed to change the rules.

(At this point Mr. DOUGLAS yielded to Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The statement by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas and the colloquy connected therewith appear in the RECORD following the remarks of Mr. DOUGLAS.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, let the record show that between what I previously stated and what I am about to say, a long delay has ensued, during which statements which will be printed at the conclusion of my remarks have been made.

At this time I shall try to resume as best I can the theme of my remarks.

What we are afraid of is that if the proceedings of the Senate go on much longer, we shall be deemed to be operating under the old rules of the Senate, including section 3 of rule XXII, which virtually prohibits any limitation of debate, and section 2, and that therefore a small and determined group of Senators by exercising their rights under sections 2 and 3 of rule XXII may so tie up the proceedings of the Senate, that the Senate—and the country—in disgust will lay aside the whole matter, and the Senate will continue with the present rules and the filibuster will flourish and exercise its evil influence.

Therefore, many of us, after studying this question rather thoroughly, have reached the conclusion that the only safe method of establishing clearly the right of the Senate to adopt rules is to do so at the beginning of the session, when the Senate would not be crippled by the straitjacket for which there was no key; namely, rule XXII.

That has been the motive behind all the parliamentary maneuvers in 1953, 1957, and this year; and it is important that the purpose be known.

I know it will be asked, "Why not delay this issue until the matter is raised? Has not the Vice President ruled that although he believes the rules of the Senate to be continuing"—and let me say that I believe he is mistaken on that point—"nevertheless, rule XXII is not operative, because in his judgment it violates the provision of the Constitution that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings; and under the Constitution, unless it is specifically stated to the contrary, majority vote is presumed to prevail."

Well, Mr. President, we are very appreciative of that advisory opinion by the Vice President. We believe it to be sound, at least insofar as rule XXII is concerned. But it has not yet become the rule of the Senate. It was quite clear that the distinguished majority leader did not agree with this proposal, or opinion. It is quite clear that the extremely able field marshal of the Southern forces, who has graced the Senate for so many years, and whom I see sitting near me at this time, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], does not agree with me or with the Vice President on this point.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator for his kind comments.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since we lack the skill and parliamentary adroitness of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Georgia, we have, I think, well founded fears that at some time it may be decided that the trap is sprung, that the previous rules of the Senate are in operation now, that by some act or other we have acquiesced in the previous rules of the Senate, and that, therefore, this trap would be so strong, that we could not escape from it and it would be impossible to limit debate on a motion to change the rules.

That is why we do not want to take the immediate course of the Johnson resolution, and that is why we are pushing, instead, for this prior action, to clear away the underbrush, to sweep away the traps, to make it perfectly obvious and clear that a majority of the Senate, at the beginning of a session, prior to the adoption of rules, can adopt those rules. I cannot put it any more simply than that. That is the purpose.

Now, I know it will be said, as indeed it has been said, that once we throw this matter open, all kinds of proposals for changes in the rules will be offered, and that we can be tied up for days and months.

In the first place, Mr. President, let me assure the Nation, that those of us who are struggling for a change in rule XXII will not, under any conditions, propose any change other than in rule XXII. If rule XXV is brought into question, if rule XL is brought in, if rule XXXII is brought in, if rule XIV is brought in, it will be by other hands than ours. I think I can make the pledge, though it is always difficult to make a pledge on behalf of a considerable body of liberals, since we do not operate under the iron discipline under which our friends to the south seem to operate, that any such widened attempt to change the rules will not come from us. Indeed, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has just said, we are now contemplating, and I personally favor, the adoption of an amendment to the Anderson motion which will confine the Anderson motion to considering a change in rule XXII.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. I shall be glad to yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. HOLLAND. Will the Senator be good enough to tell us whether the members of the group with which he is associated, and of which he is such an eminent member, have agreed on the provision of change, which they wish to write into rule XXII?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. That would be left open.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then the Senator is, in effect, asking that the matter be thrown open so that the various proponents of change may have an opportunity to discuss varied convictions as to what the change should be?

Mr. DOUGLAS. In rule XXII, certainly. But not on other rules.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The adoption of the Anderson motion, therefore, will not lead to the broad questions about all other rules, as claimed by the opponents. It will result in the Senate's having before it the narrow question of its filibuster rule, which is the heart of the controversy. But the adoption of the Anderson motion will establish the basic principle that a majority of the Senate in a new Congress can adopt or amend Senate rules for that new Senate, free from the restrictions of the old rules, which in effect rigidly limit that rule-making power.

The adoption of the Anderson motion and the Senate's action on the next motion—because either the Anderson motion will carry with it the fact that all other rules except rule XXII will be in operation, or it will be followed immediately by another motion by the Senator from New Mexico that all rules except rule XXII shall be in effect—will demonstrate that we can move in an orderly manner, as our associates in the House of Representatives do, at the start of a new Congress.

I am astounded by the contention that the Senate, which is declared to be such a deliberative body, composed of such noble and reasonable men, who have a high sense of the values of the Nation, will simply prove itself inferior to the House of Representatives, which deals with this issue very quickly—very quickly indeed—at the opening of a new Congress. I do not claim that we are the higher body. I do not say that we are superior to the House, although I notice that a great many Members of the House like to run for the Senate, and not many Members of the Senate like to resign their seats and run for the House. I do not claim that we are superior to the House. But I do say we are at least as sensible as the House and as coordinated as the House, and that if the House can adopt new rules at every session, the Senate also can do it. I do not say that everything the House can do, the Senate can do better; but I do say everything the House can do, the Senate can do as well.

There is another interesting point. Our friends from the South seem to worry a great deal about the possibility that the debate at some time or another may be limited. They are great statesmen. Our southern friends, in the creation of rules for their State legislatures in the South, virtually without exception have provided for a method of closing debate. The method which they provide is the device known as the previous question, which is the affirmative analog of a motion to table. Once a motion to move the previous question is put forward, there can be no debate upon that motion. If it is carried, the motion before the House must be immediately put, without any debate upon it. The device of the previous question is a complete guillotine. Yet in the South our good friends in the State legislatures provide for this guillotine, which we would not dare, and not only would not dare, but would not desire, to impose upon the Senate when it is considering legislation, even though it might be used after long debate in the consideration of rules and if a filibuster was evident.

The men who founded the Confederate States of America were, I think, mistaken in wanting to split off from the Union. But as a matter of parliamentary procedure, they had a very effective device for closing debate in the Confederate Senate, namely, the moving of the previous question and the power of a majority to carry it.

Why do our southern friends want to impose upon the Senate of the United States rigid restrictions against the limitation of debate and against the amendment of our rules which their own State senates do not impose on themselves and which the Senate of the Confederate States, beloved by their predecessors, did not impose upon itself.

I regret that my good friend from Georgia used the expression this afternoon that the Senate consisted of ambassadors from their sovereign States. That, perhaps, was the interpretation, under the Articles of Confederation, and the Delegates to the Continental Congress I think, perhaps, primarily regarded themselves as such.

But we are a United States now—and have been a United States for at least 93 years. I regret to see the pre-1860 language used upon the floor of the Senate at the present time. We are not merely Senators from Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Alaska, Ohio, Michigan, Utah, North Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina; we are also Senators of the United States of America. It is about time that fact is realized.

My friend, Carl Sandburg, says that the war of 1861 to 1865 was fought on the question of grammar; whether the proper phrase should be "the United States are" or "the United States is"; whether we are a mere federation of sovereign States or whether we are a nation.

I am not here to wave the bloody shirt or to refight that war. I will merely say that since 1865, at least, the United States is a nation—is a nation. There perhaps are some people who do not realize this fact now, but I want to predict that they are going to realize it. The United States is a nation, and we meet in one House of that Nation, representing our State interests, it is true, but also representing our national interests, and the national interests should be controlling and predominant.

What bearing does that have on this dispute? It has this bearing: that the Senate is not an assembly of the United Nations. Neither is it a Security Council of the United Nations. No one in this body should have the power of the veto. No small groups should have the power of the veto.

The Constitution provides that the majority will is to prevail except in those matters which are specifically stated to the contrary, and there are only five such. The Constitution states that amendments to the Constitution must be submitted by a two-thirds vote of both Houses; that treaties must be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate; that impeachment requires a two-thirds vote; that expulsion of a Member requires a two-thirds vote; and that to override a veto a two-thirds vote is required.

But on every other subject a majority is supposed to prevail, in default of specific language to the contrary. There is no such language about House rules or Senate rules. There is no such provision in the Constitution in connection with civil rights laws. It is not stated that one must have a two-thirds vote on a civil rights law. It is not stated that one must have a two-thirds vote on a commerce law. A two-thirds vote is not required for a declaration of war.

As a matter of fact, in the Constitutional Convention itself one of the delegates arose and proposed that a two-thirds vote be made necessary for interstate and foreign commerce laws, and that was voted down. There was one other feature of the Constitutional Convention also—navigation laws, I believe—in which a two-thirds vote was proposed and was defeated.

It is therefore perfectly clear where the Constitution stands. The Constitution stands for majority rule, but a majority rule which is carefully guarded—which requires the assent of both Houses, which is subject to a Presidential veto and subject to review by the courts.

We already have built-in protections for minorities and other groups, and long may we continue to have them.

Furthermore, by the so-called Connecticut compromise, to which my friend the Senator from Minnesota referred this afternoon, we have equality of representation in the Senate of all States regardless of size.

My State has about 9½ million people. I voted for the admission of Alaska as a State, though Alaska has only a little over 200,000 people. I was very glad to see my two good friends from Alaska sworn in yesterday—long may they stay in this body—but I want to point out the tremendous power which we in the big States gave to the small States when we voted for the admission of Alaska and when we voted for the admission of other smaller States.

As a matter of fact, 17 States with only 8 percent of the population could, if acting in a bloc, under the existing rules of the Senate and under the rules as proposed by the Senate from Texas, by filibustering, tie up the Senate and prevent the representatives of the other 92 percent of the population from having their will.

On the other hand, the 8 largest States in the Union, of which my State is one, with a total population of 75 million, or about 43 percent of the population of the Nation, have only the same representation in the Senate as the 8 smallest States, with a very small percentage of the population. They are already shackled.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would prefer to finish my statement and then yield for a question.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The question is on the point the Senator just mentioned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the Senator recall that when Illinois was admitted as a State the population of Illinois was only 34,620?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct. The Senator from South Dakota, however, need not be reminded of the fact that I voted for the admission of Alaska as a State and worked for it on every occasion. I shall vote for the admission of Hawaii as a State.

I merely want to remind this body of the fact that we who come from the big States have been willing to subordinate our local interests in the national interest. It was against the narrow interest of my State to admit Alaska as a State, because I know the pressures which will operate upon the Senators from Alaska for very large improvements, for which the citizens of my State and of other large States of the Nation will pay most of the taxes. I am willing to take that chance and be governed by a majority vote in which we who represent large States can be outvoted by those who represent small States.

What I am trying to say is that we already have built-in protections for minorities even under a majority provision; protection in the form of two Houses of Congress, protection in the form of the presidential veto; protection in the form of judicial review; and protection to the small States on the basis of equality of representation.

If on top of all this we have heaped upon us the power of a small group in the Senate to prevent us even from coming to a vote, there will be placed mighty and powerful chains upon us.

Mr. President, this is the opening battle. I hope it is not the only battle, but it is the opening battle in an important struggle on this issue. While logically I should perhaps confine myself to procedural problems, it may be well to dissipate some unfounded fears. Let me assure the Members of the Senate and of the Nation that we do not propose to shut off debate.

We believe in full debate, full discussion—protracted debate, because many issues need to be made clear, not merely to the Senate, but to the country. But we believe that there is also the right of a majority at some time to reach a vote. The right of the majority to rule does not mean merely that when the ballot is cast the majority shall prevail. The right of the majority also to have a measure ultimately brought up for a vote is also an essential part of the right of majority rule. That is what we are contending for.

This is not the place to discuss in detail the proposed rule XXII which I shall offer later in behalf of a distinguished group of Senators. Under that proposed rule, there could be made available 8 weeks of debate. I would be willing to extend it so that there could be 10 or 12 weeks of debate.

It must be remembered that in the first place the petition for a limitation of debate would not be presented by 16 Senators until the debate had continued for some time, and it became evident that we were facing a filibuster.

Under the first alternative, it would be necessary to have a two-thirds vote, after 2 days, to apply a limitation thereafter of 1 hour for each Senator. This is the same as the proposal of the Senator from Texas.

But we go beyond that, to give the ultimate power to a majority of the entire membership of the Senate—and I emphasize the words "majority of the entire membership of the Senate"—15 days, not including Sundays or holidays, after the filing of the petition by 16 Senators, to limit debate thereafter to 1 hour. That ought to be enough even for a Senator.

Mr. HUMPHREY. One hour for each Senator?

Mr. DOUGLAS. One hour for each Senator.

As the beloved former Senator from New York, Herbert Lehman, who led the struggle for many years, pointed out in a very able letter to the Washington Evening Star, that this long process could be twice repeated. A determined minority could filibuster on a motion to proceed to consider a measure, and the majority would not be able to limit debate on that question for 5 or 6 weeks. Then on the measure itself the minority could filibuster and the majority would not be able to limit debate for 5 or 6 weeks more. At least 8 or 10 weeks could be taken advantage of. There would be full discussion. There would be no danger of premature or hasty decision.

If there were weaknesses in the pending measure, they would be revealed in the course of the debate. Mr. Lippmann and others have been saying that Claude Pepper and Bob Taft showed up the weaknesses in connection with the Truman proposal in 1946 to draft railway labor. They did it in 6 days. If Taft and Pepper could do it in 6 days, certainly it would be possible for others to do it in 60 days.

Discussion is a very important thing. Free debate is essential for decision. Truth and error contest against each other, and error is sifted out in the long run and truth is accepted. If certain proposals are advanced which are partly correct and have some errors in them, the errors can be corrected. But discussion is not an end in itself. The ultimate end of legislative discussion is decision, whether this be positive or negative. The process of free debate and ultimate decision is what we believe in within a democracy.

Those are the principles for which we are contending. The Anderson motion would make it possible for us to decide every one of the issues involved in the proposed changes in rule XXII without experiencing a filibuster in the process of deciding.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was interested in the Senator's discussion of his proposed substitute. The Senator knows that I am for free debate in the Senate. I am against provisions that impose a gag rule. However, if the Senator wishes to close off debate, it seems to me that the present rule, or even the Johnson substitute, would be preferable to what the Senator is advocating, which would permit 60 days of debate. It seems to me that if the leadership were determined to reach a vote, they could simply table any amendment. That would leave each Senator in a position where he could make only two speeches. With only two speeches on a particular measure the debate would not extend for 60 days.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Perhaps I erred in discussing the substantive features of the proposed new rule XXII. Perhaps it would have been better if I had confined myself to the narrow limits of the Anderson motion. I do not wish to prolong the discussion too long, because my friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] will shortly address the Senate. He is one of the finest spirits in the Senate and in the country, and I expect to listen with interest to what he has to say. So I do not wish to argue this point at great length now. We shall meet later at Philippi.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks editorials from the New York Times, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and Commonweal, and other materials, containing significant statements relative to the Anderson proposals and our proposals for an effective curb on filibusters, together with letters from Senator Clark and Senator Lehman, Irving Brant the eminent historian, and myself—and perhaps most important of all, the brief which a group of us Senators presented to the Vice President some days ago, which lays a thorough basis for our contention.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 7, 1959]

THE MAJORITY HAS RIGHTS TOO

When the Senate organizes for business today it will have before it a proposal by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, supported by other liberal Senators, to permit the majority, after a decent interval for reflection and debate, to get on with the country's business. This proposal is perhaps the most important single subject that will come before either House of the 86th Congress. Senator DOUGLAS and his associates propose that rule XXII be amended so that a simple majority of the whole Senate may impose closure after 15 days. After this interval debate could continue until each Senator had had an ample chance to speak, but a filibuster could not continue. The whole process of bringing a measure to vote over the opposition of an entrenched minority might take a month or more, but at the end of that time a vote could be had and the majority would prevail.

We admit the existence of honest arguments against this reform. There are those who fear that unwise legislation may be steamrollered through Congress. But the choice seems to us to be between a reasonable delay and a reasonable amount of discussion, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the actual rule of a minority. It is easy to find arguments against what has been called the tyranny of the majority, but the tyranny of the minority is and always has been infinitely worse. For instance, there is no reason under heaven why a minority in the South or anywhere else should prevent this Nation from enacting a modern bill of civil rights.

There will be an effort in the House of Representatives to reduce the power of the Rules Committee, which now is usually able to put bills in the deep freeze and keep them there. This machinery, which the leadership of the low House controls, has the same result that rule XXII effectuates in the Senate—namely, to prevent bills which a minority dislikes from being brought to the floor at all. But the situation in the House, with SAM RAYBURN in the Speaker's chair, is not as bad as the situation in the Senate with an unamended rule XXII.

The election wave of last November was not merely a Democratic wave, it was also an expression of a reviving liberalism. We shall be deeply disappointed if this liberalism does not reveal itself in a democratic revision of rule XXII.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 13, 1958]

THE POWER OF DECISION

As lines form for the Senate fight on the filibuster, that tactic of obstruction is once more being defended as a vital instrument of freedom. The power to paralyze legislation by unlimited talk is described as an essential protection of minorities against the tyrannous majority, a necessary element in the checks and balances of our governmental system.

How much validity is there in these claims? Not much. Minorities are entitled to reasonable protection against the hasty, illegal, or oppressive acts of a runaway majority, but they are not entitled to the privilege of paralyzing the legislative process itself. The safeguards which they can legitimately claim are embedded in the structure of our system in the two branches of Congress, each having a different basis of representation; in the committee system of both branches in the Executive veto; in the power of judicial review.

To say that all of these very real protections for minority rights come to naught unless a handful of Senators shall have the right to abuse the very nature of parliamentary debate is to abandon all sense of proportion.

The purpose of debate is to enlighten, to inform, to bring out the merits and evils of proposed legislation. None of these ends is served by permitting a Senator to read the telephone book and a shelf full of encyclopedias until his colleagues out of sheer exhaustion give up their right to come to a decision.

The filibuster is not debate. It is an act of coercion. It is as undemocratic as a shillelagh, and the use of it is as disruptive of parliamentary process as would be the defeat of a bill at the point of a gun.

Those who paint the filibuster as a sacred element of our constitutional system neglect to mention some of the facts brought out often by Senator DOUGLAS. The British Parliament, which supplied so many of the precedents for our Congress, has always had machinery for closing debate by a simple majority. The Continental Congress had such machinery. The House has always had it. And the Senate itself not only could but did close debate by majority vote in the first 20 years of its existence. The filibuster was invented, not to protect minorities, but to give a handful of Senators disproportionate power to control legislation.

We think the defenders of the filibuster have damaged their case by offering to accept a rule under which debate can be ended by two-thirds of those attending, instead of two-thirds of the Senate membership as at present. If it is true, as they say, that to alter the filibuster means altering the institutional character of the Senate, then they ought to offer no compromise at all. By temporizing with the growing Senate demand for a change in the rules, they tacitly confess that they are defending not principle but power.

Nobody is contending for any serious strictures upon real debate. The Douglas proposal would allow more than ample time for full discussion of an issue before the majority could move to close debate, and even then each speaker would have an hour for more talk before closure went into effect. What this rule would do is to insure that the Senate could fulfill the ultimate function of every legislative body—to decide.

Is that uncharacteristic of the Senate, dangerous to minorities, or hostile to constitutional balance? If so, then so is democracy.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Jan. 4, 1959]

TEST FOR THE SENATE

Probably the first, and certainly one of the most important, issues to face the new Senate when it convenes this week will be the question of the filibuster. At present, the votes of 64 Senators—an "absolute two-thirds"—are required to bring debate on any measure to an end—which means that a determined minority can usually block a vote on a measure by talking it to death. Should the rules be changed to permit fewer than 64 Senators to close debate?

We believe the answer is Yes, and we believe the new rule should be the one supported by Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, and other liberals in both parties.

Senator DOUGLAS would permit two-thirds of the Senators present to close debate after 2 days; but if debate continued for more than 15 days, it could then be terminated by a majority of Senators on the floor. In actual practice, the Douglas plan would permit a debate to run as long as 8 or 9 weeks—certainly long enough to air the most controversial issue—before a majority could bring the issue to decision.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON is supporting a milder rules change in an effort to head off the Douglas plan. The Democratic majority leader would provide simply that debate could be closed at any time by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Various kinds of arithmetic can be used to argue that this rule would be an improvement. The best answer is that precisely the same rule was in effect in the Senate from 1917 to 1949—and filibusters were no easier to break during that period than they are now.

That is why the Johnson plan is not enough and the Douglas plan should be adopted. Basically, the question is whether the Senate should have the power to come to a decision, or whether a minority should retain the power to block any decision by abusing the privilege of debate.

We cannot agree with Walter Lippmann and others who argue that this minority power to block a decision is a necessary part of our constitutional balance. Plenty of checks and balances exist—in the two-house system, the workings of seniority, the presidential veto, and the power of judicial review—but the anarchic principle of the filibuster is not and was never meant to be one of them. Nor is it true that the filibuster is needed for the protection of individual rights. The Douglas proposal would permit quite as much protection as individual rights ever get in the Senate—and in addition it would permit the Senate to come to a decision on vital issues of controversy, including civil rights.

Every Senator will be measured by the way he votes on the filibuster this week.

[From the Commonweal, Dec. 19, 1958]

CURBING FILIBUSTERS

As it has developed through the years the American system of governmental checks and balances has few equals among parliamentary democracies of the world. Such things as the separation of powers, local autonomies, and the lengthy procedure for the making of the Nation's laws are of the essence—as are the rights and freedoms prescribed for the individual citizen. Even the possibility that an upsurge of popular feeling might lead to tyrannical dictation by a democratic majority is provided against through the procedure of the senatorial filibuster.

This obstructive parliamentary device goes back for more than a century to the days when opponents of financial bills sponsored by Henry Clay resorted to it. One of its theoretical bases is that no U.S. Senator should be limited in his discussion of any question. And in recent times, at least, filibustering Senators have been permitted to talk or read endlessly on any subject as a demonstration of opposition so determined that the Senate should think twice before enacting a proposed law.

For three-quarters of a century opponents of legislation resorted to filibusters without restriction. A number of bills and an even greater number of appropriations met death in this fashion. Often a serious threat of a filibuster sufficed to defeat legislation. Then on the eve of World War I a handful of Senators, "11 willful men," held up Woodrow Wilson's plan to arm American merchantmen against German U-boats. As a result a cloture rule was passed setting forth the conditions under which debate could be closed and a vote taken. These provisions supplied the basis in 1949 for rule XXII, still in force.

In order to break up a filibuster and proceed to a vote, 66 Senators must now be present and approve. After that, further debate is limited in that each Senator who speaks can do so for not more than an hour. In view of senatorial courtesies, a voting margin as large as this is difficult to attain under most circumstances. When civil rights legislation is involved, as at present, the vehement southern minority has proved large enough, with the help of a few friends from other sections, to block a cloture of debate.

When the 86th Congress opens next month it will consider two types of revision for rule 22. The first is a bipartisan measure sponsored by Senators DOUGLAS, HUMPHREY, CASE and JAVITS. For emergency legislation it would still require a two-thirds vote of Senators present for cloture. For other legislation a constitutional majority of 50 Senators would be sufficient after 3 intervals of protracted debate. And 15 days of further debate would then be permitted—involving 2 months' discussion in all.

The other proposed revision, favored by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, is offered as a compromise. Instead of 66 Senators, two-thirds of those present and voting could bring about the end of a filibuster. Here again the determination of a minority such as the representatives of the South would be virtually impossible to overcome. Their own 20 votes plus the dozen or so of conservative colleagues from the West and North would be marshaled with greater effectiveness than the less organized, scattered senatorial majority. A study of similar votes in the past 40 years discloses that cloture would not have been obtained on any civil rights bill under such requirements. The chances of restricting filibusters would remain virtually unchanged even with the complexion of the new Congress.

The terms of the bipartisan cloture bill appear, however, eminently reasonable. There is ample opportunity for full-scale debate. By the time a proposed piece of legislation is reported out of committee and goes through the various steps envisaged there is no chance of its being hasty or ill-considered. The American system of checks and balances will remain, both structurally and in the persons of widely differing, highly placed representatives. The possibility that a majority can tyrannize will continue to remain remote.

To say this is not to deny that the filibuster still has a useful place in American political life. It is not to ignore the fact that it is a device that can on occasion be put to good use both by political liberals and conservatives. It is not to imply that only a filibuster stands between the present impasse in the South and the formulation and enactment of a truly wise and effective civil rights bill at this difficult stage of transition. But support of a real if limited change in the Senate's rule of cloture is one prerequisite, and it would be a congressional achievement of the first rank.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 9, 1958]

EXCERPT FROM STATEMENT ON POLICY ISSUED BY THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY'S ADVISORY COUNCIL—CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURES

The Senate will face a challenge that can only be met in its opening days.

The challenge is to change Senate rule XXII which now requires a two-thirds vote of the total members to shut off debate and which provides for no limitation whatsoever of debate on proposals for changes in any rule of the Senate, including rule XXII.

The Democratic Advisory Council, as it did on January 4, 1957, once again takes its stand on the relevant 1956 Democratic platform plank. The language of that plank—the Republican platform is altogether silent—unequivocally calls for improved congressional procedures so that majority rule prevails, and decisions can be made after reasonable debate without being blocked by a minority in either House.

We reaffirm this position and state these propositions:

First, we believe that every new Senate, like every new House, has the constitutional and democratic right to make its own rules of procedure.

Second, in any new rule for the limitation of debate, the need for full and searching discussion in which all Senators may speak and in which public opinion can make its own influence felt, must be duly respected. But the new rule must also be such that after a respectable interval of time, the Senate shall be able to give relevance to the debate by bringing the matters under discussion to a terminal vote where the decision of the majority of the total membership shall close the debate. There can be no compromise with this ultimate, democratic right of the majority to say yes or no on legislative issues.

FORTHCOMING SENATE ISSUE—SENATOR CLARK QUESTIONS RECENT ANTIFILIBUSTER DRIVE COMMENTS

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Arthur Krock's November 19 column provided a valuable preview of the epic liberal-conservative struggle which is bound to take place in the Senate of the United States as soon as the opening formalities have been dispensed with on January 7, 1959.

The value of Mr. Krock's column, however, could hardly be said to lie in its impartiality. His assertion that the antifilibuster drive is an assault on the "continuing body" concept that has made the Senate a "fortress of the minority" invites two observations:

The "minority" referred to in the quotation is not the Negro people; and the "continuing body" argument has repeatedly been demonstrated as irrelevant to the question of whether Senate rule XXII should be amended to prevent filibusters.

This argument holds that since two-thirds of the Members of the Senate are not up for election in any given year by virtue of their staggered 6-year terms, the Senate is a "continuing body," therefore (in smaller print) the rules of past Senates have a "continuing" effect and bind each new Senate. The conclusion does not follow the premise.

The "therefore" portion of this argument was supported by Mr. Krock, unquestionably Washington's leading legal layman, by citation of a statement by a deceased Senate historian and a 1927 Supreme Court opinion.

CHALLENGE BY SENATE

The historian's assertion that the Senate rules "have continued in force without reaffirmation until amended or abolished" amounts only to a record of acquiescence on the part of past Senates which creates no legal bar to the challenge to be posed by the incoming Senate.

The cited reference to the Senate as a "continuing body" by Justice Van Devanter in McGrain v. Daugherty (1927) had nothing to do with Senate rules and consequently carries little weight with the legal profession. All that the Court held in that case was that a warrant of arrest issued and served by the Senate of the 68th Congress for contempt of a Senate committee by a witness could not be contested in a habeas corpus proceeding solely on the ground that the Congress had adjourned. It was noted in the opinion that the committee still had the power to convene and that it could be continued or revived by the incoming Senate.

Omitted from Mr. Krock's pro and con presentation of the issues was any reference to the only authority directly on point in this matter: the opinion of the Vice President on January 4, 1957, in response to a parliamentary inquiry as to whether "the rules of the Senate continue from one Congress to another." It read in part as follows:

"Where the membership of the Senate changes as it does from the election of each Congress, it is the Chair's opinion that there can be no question but that the majority of the new existing membership of the Senate, under the Constitution, has the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed."

CHANGING RULES

When we turn from law to fact the contention that the Senate is a continuing body seems even sillier. No bill introduced in the 85th Congress can be passed by the 86th without reintroduction and reference to committee; the committees of the 85th Congress must be reconstituted and have no continuing power over matters pending when the 85th Congress dies; the authority of the majority and minority leaders, the whips, the President pro tempore, all expire. How absurd to suppose the rules continue if a majority decides it wants to change them.

Those of us who favor the restoration of true majority rule in the Senate by amendment of rule XXII to permit full but limited debate on any given issue are confident of success in January. There will be few real tears shed at that time for the long-overdue burial of that old fraud, the "continuing body."

ON THE SENATE FILIBUSTER RULE

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR:

I would like to comment on a recent column by William S. White dealing with the impending effort to modify the Senate filibuster rule. In general, I am an admirer of Mr. White's writing and reportorial talents, but the column in question was not, I fear, an impartial commentary. It was too much slanted in a southerly direction.

I was certainly taken aback by Mr. White's implicit thesis, namely, that the Senate's present filibuster rule is a safeguard for liberal causes and principles. I was a Member of the Senate from 1949 to 1957, and had some experience fighting for liberal causes and principles. I always found the filibuster rule (rule XXII) working against those causes and principles rather than for them.

As a matter of fact, the present form of rule XXII, as adopted in 1949, was drafted with only one purpose in mind; to perpetuate the power of southern Senators to block civil rights legislation, even if such legislation was desired by a substantial majority of the Senate and of the country.

I know something of the history of the filibuster rule, and of previous Senate filibusters, dating back to the early days of the Republic. Until 1806, the Senate had no rule protecting the filibuster. The Senate and the country got along pretty well without it.

In a compilation of Senate filibusters dating back to 1841, made by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress in 1951, 41 filibusters are recorded. During that period, 36 legislative bills and 82 appropriation bills were killed by means of filibusters. Until about 20 years ago, filibusters were frequently conducted against appropriation bills, and rivers and harbor bills, seeking to force the inclusion of some local pork barrel item into these bills.

Since 1938, almost all filibusters have been conducted against civil rights bills. In general, the filibuster, and the threat of filibuster, are responsible for the fact that until 1957 the Senate had not, for 75 years, been able to reach a vote on a civil rights bill.

When I use the word "filibuster," I mean genuine filibusters. A true filibuster, by definition, is an effort to prevent a proposal from coming to a vote. A speech or a series of speeches, intended solely to delay a vote to a later time, is not a filibuster. It is a filibuster only when its purpose is to prevent a vote entirely. Mr. White accepts this definition, when he says that a filibuster "is endless talking to prevent a vote."

But Mr. White forgets about his own definition, when, in asserting that liberal Senators have used the filibuster to further their own views and principles, he cites a marathon speech by Senator WAYNE MORSE in 1953, in opposition to the tidelands oil giveaway bill. Mr. White overlooks the fact that Senator MORSE's speech on that occasion was not a true filibuster. It was not an effort to prevent a vote. It was an effort to present a case so that public opinion could be mobilized prior to the vote. The opponents of the tidelands oil giveaway repeatedly asserted at the time that they were not trying to prevent a vote, but would, at the conclusion of the presentation of their case, welcome a vote. There was a vote.

Mr. White makes his further departure from the standards of impartial commentary when he refers to the current proposal being urged by Senators DOUGLAS, HUMPHREY, JAVITS, CASE, and others to amend the filibuster rule.

Under the terms of the Douglas, Humphrey, Javits, Case proposal, Mr. White says, "The slimmest Senate majority, after 15 days, could adopt any kind of a bill under public pressure, informed or uninformed." This proposed change in rule XXII is sweepingly characterized by Mr. White as "so extreme that its adoption would end the Senate as a unique deliberative body."

This is a very misleading and untrue statement. The Douglas, Humphrey, Javits, Case proposal is actually a very moderate one, which carefully preserves the role of the Senate as a deliberative forum for extended debate and appeal to the public conscience and opinion. But under the terms of this proposed change in the rules, practical means are provided to bring controversial legislation eventually to a vote—and I mean, eventually.

The Douglas, Humphrey, Javits, Case proposal provides for an end to debate, in the case of emergency legislation, by a vote of two-thirds of those present, or, for other legislation, by a vote of a constitutional majority (a majority of the total membership of the Senate) after three periods of extended debate: (a) Unlimited debate up to the time of the filing of a cloture petition signed by at least 16 Senators; (b) 15 days of debate following the filing of a cloture petition; and (c) a limited debate in which each Senator is permitted to speak for 1 hour after cloture has been ordered by the affirmative vote of at least 50 Senators.

Moreover—and this is frequently forgotten—the first cloture motion to limit debate would ordinarily be applied to a necessary preliminary motion to take up the substantive measure. In other words, there could be a practical minimum of 1 month of debate on just a preliminary procedural motion. Then there could be at least another month of debate on the substantive measure itself until all debate could be shut off and the Senate could proceed to vote on the legislation.

Can a proposed rule which would permit a practical minimum of 2 months of debate, before a piece of legislation could be forced to vote, be properly described as extreme or dangerous to the status of the Senate as a deliberative body? I scarcely think so. Of course, Mr. White in his analysis of the Douglas, Humphrey, Javits, Case proposal seems to admit that the present filibuster rule is not a perfect one. Indeed his analysis seems to point in the direction of a particular modification which has been referred to as the Lyndon Johnson proposal—to permit cloture by a vote of a simple two-thirds—two-thirds of the Senators present—instead of a constitutional two-thirds now required. In fact this is a mere shadow proposal without substance. A study of the cloture votes of the past 40 years shows that not a single motion on a civil rights bill would have prevailed even if the requirement had been a simple two-thirds, instead of a constitutional two-thirds. This change in the filibuster rule would be virtually meaningless.

There is much more I could say in support of the Douglas, Humphrey, Javits, Case proposal for a change in the filibuster rule. But I have already gone on too long.

Basically, this is a complex and technical subject, although its essence is simple. Surely the effect of the present filibuster rule is very simple. It prevents the Senate from considering and voting on any legislation to which there is a determined opposition by a minority which is willing to paralyze the work of the Senate, of the Congress, and of the Government, in order to frustrate the will of the majority.

Mr. White has unfortunately sought to justify the present rule. In my judgment, it cannot be justified.

In my judgment, the present rule—rather than the proposed change in the rule—threatens not only the status of the Senate, but the most vital interest of our country.

By preventing the Congress from dealing constructively with the subject of civil rights—which Congress should have done years ago—the filibuster rule has helped to bring about the present civil rights crisis.

The hour is already very late on the clock of history. But if the new Senate, with a fresh mandate given by the people on November 4, moves promptly to rectify past errors, it may still not be too late.

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 31, 1958]

HOW MUCH DEBATE IS NEEDED?

It seems to me that Walter Lippmann showed distrust of the principles of American Government in his December 25 column, "Majorities and Civil Rights." In opposing the Douglas resolution for limiting senatorial debate, he does not argue that it would make the debate too short. On the contrary, he grants that "8 or 9 weeks of debate is quite sufficient for any measure." That is the practical minimum provided for in the proposed rule, which would permit ultimate limitation by a majority of the entire Senate membership.

The question is, he says, "under what conditions should you override" a minority that tries to prevent a vote by filibustering tactics even after adequate debate. His conclusion is that it should never be overridden at any time by less than two-thirds of those present and voting because the decision of controversial questions by a narrow majority increases "the prospect of resistance and nullification."

The Senate in 1917 authorized limitation of debate by two-thirds of those present and voting. In 1949 it stiffened the rule to require two-thirds of the entire membership. The moderate revisionists say, let's go back to the 1917 rule.

How did that rule work? Since 1917, cloture has been moved 22 times and failed 18 times, including all civil rights cases. If the 1917 rule had been in force all the time it would have failed 18 times. So let's go back from Tweedle Dum to Tweedle Dee. Under the Douglas proposal, only 9 of the 22 filibusters, including 2 on civil rights, would have been broken by a majority of the full Senate. Does that constitute a peril to government?

To sustain his argument Mr. Lippmann cites the case of President Truman's request for a law to draft striking railroad workers into the Army. "The House," he writes, "was stampeded into passing this bill two hours after the President's message by a vote of 306 to 13. But Senators Taft and Wagner held it up in the Senate, and after six days of debate its sponsors were compelled to omit the provisions for a draft." So, six days' debate in the Senate produced a majority against a dangerous bill which had passed the House almost unanimously. Does that mean that a majority of the entire Senate membership cannot be trusted to require a vote on any measure, good or bad, after eight or nine weeks of debate?

Mr. Lippmann names the instances in which the Constitution requires a two-thirds vote for affirmative action—on constitutional amendments, treaties, overriding of Presidential vetoes, impeachment, expulsion of Members.

By the mere fact of citing these constitutional restrictions, as an argument against control of filibusters by a majority of the entire Senate, Mr. Lippmann in effect proposes two amendments to the Constitution, to be enforced by a rule of the Senate without submission to the States or ratification by them. In one aspect his argument adds limitation of debate in the Senate to the constitutional list requiring a two-thirds vote. In another aspect it removes the power of enforcing the Bill of Rights, and especially the 14th amendment, from the category of legislation which Congress is constitutionally empowered to enact by the votes of a majority of both Houses.

The framers of the Constitution faced that very question when the demand was made in the Convention of 1787 that no navigation laws be passed by less than a two-thirds vote. They rejected it, in spite of the intense Southern fear of Federal regulation of commerce by and for the North. Discord followed. Would paralysis have been better?

The choice, as Mr. Lippmann sees it, is whether the indisputable rights of Negroes should be obtained by simple majorities in Congress (supporting unanimous decisions of the Supreme Court) or by winning the assent of the rapidly growing enlightened opinion of the South. By this he means white opinion.

The real choice is quite different. It is whether whole generations of Negroes shall be deprived of their indisputable rights (the words are Mr. Lippmann's) while awaiting a possible change of heart in those who deny them their lawful rights and flout the courts. The question is whether the enlightened white southerners of this present day shall continue to be choked into humiliating silence as the alternative to economic ruin, while Congress and the President fail to face up to a crisis made ever more acute and dangerous by their inaction.

President Eisenhower is restrained by his chronic unwillingness to measure up to his legal and moral responsibilities—a condition which he can change tomorrow if he has the will to do so. The Senate is restrained by a stultifying filibuster rule, changeable next week.

It will be a sad day for this country, and for all the peoples of the world who look to us for leadership, if the dodging of legislative responsibility is to be rationalized into distrust of a thoroughly informed congressional majority. That attitude dooms millions of American citizens to indefinite continuation of a semiservile status. It proclaims to the entire world that we lack faith in our own capacity for self-government through representatives chosen by the people and subject to the restraints of public opinion and the Constitution.

IRVING BRANT.

WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D.C., December 26, 1958.

EDITOR, LETTERS TO THE EDITOR COLUMN,
The Washington Post and Times Herald,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Walter Lippmann's opposition (Washington Post, December 25) to a change in Senate rules to enable a majority of those elected to shut off a filibuster and come to a vote after full debate, is especially regrettable in view of the thoughtful character of his general comments on national and world events.

Basically it seems to me that his is a counsel of nullification and despair.

He does not, like some, charge that the rule change we propose would endanger full and fair debate. Indeed he frankly concedes that our proposal would permit about 8 weeks of debate by a determined opposition before a majority of the whole Senate could end a filibuster and vote. He also concedes that Senator Johnson's proposed change is little different from the present filibuster rule.

Instead he bases his opposition on the claim that on a very controversial issue—like equal protection of the laws for our Negro citizens—a majority of the whole Senate should not have the power to act. It should not, he asserts, be able to override the opposition of the South, which has traditionally used filibustering tactics in the Senate to block a vote on such measures.

This doctrine is obviously in the tradition of John C. Calhoun.

Clearly this is a principle of allowing the elected representatives of a section of our country to veto action believed necessary by most of the Nation, including much enlightened opinion in the South. In the face of widespread denials of constitutional rights to equal protection of the laws in many sections of the country, it would deny Congress the power to act. The 14th amendment, which grants these rights and expressly gives Congress the power to enforce them, and the historic decisions of the Court interpreting them would thus continue to be nullified. Only with the assent of the South's elected representatives would Mr. Lippmann allow the Nation to act.

I cannot believe such a surrender to nullification is in the best interests of the country. It places a premium upon resistance to the Constitution and the orders of the Court—and in extreme situations, upon lawlessness. It takes away the hope of orderly, thoroughly debated legislative assistance for those deprived of their rights. It prevents the Nation from marshalling its resources of reason and law to make a deliberate transition to compliance with the Constitution and the moral principles that undergird it.

And I believe Mr. Lippmann in this case ignores another overriding factor to which he is ordinarily so sensitive, the responsibility of our country in leading the forces of freedom in the world. The two-thirds of the peoples belonging to various colored races and the one-third subject to Communist tyranny are carefully watching our treatment of our racial minorities. We gravely damage the whole Nation in its struggle against tyranny if we allow it to renege on its promises to its own colored citizens.

But that is what the present filibuster rule in the Senate does, and what the slight modification proposed by Senator JOHNSON to a simple two-thirds limitation would do. That was the rule from 1917 to 1949. It did not work. No debate limitation on a civil rights bill was passed even once, though it was tried eight times and secured large majorities—but not two-thirds—twice, in 1950.

Mr. Lippmann correctly points out that the Constitution provides for a two-thirds vote in some cases—treaties, overriding vetoes, expulsion, impeachment, and constitutional amendments.

But those cases are carefully and specifically provided. They furnish no justification for the Senate by its rules in effect to amend the Constitution further so that on civil rights bills or other controversial measures a two-thirds vote in the Senate is required. Mr. Lippmann would in effect compel the Senate to secure the same two-thirds vote to enforce the 14th amendment that the Constitution required for its initial passage.

The issue of whether or not to declare war and many other life-and-death matters are not thus put at the mercy of a small Senate minority by the Constitution. And neither those issues, nor the equal protection of the laws, should be thus subjected to a minority veto by the Senate rules.

Furthermore, beyond the opportunities for prolonged debate which our proposed filibuster-limitation rule still affords, the smaller States and Southern States already have the built-in protection in the Senate of having 2 Senators for each State, regardless of population. Thus the 24 smallest States with less than 20 percent of our population can block action in the Senate by the 24 largest States with over 80 percent of our population even with majority rule, which Mr. Lippmann decries.

In addition the operation of the seniority system gives these small States and Southern States a heavy preponderance of the powerfull congressional committee chairmanships. Surely the foregoing factors confer enough power on the representatives of a minority even under majority rule in the Senate, without giving to 33 Senators the right to block action by 65, as the present rule does.

It is worthwhile to recall that the smallest 17 States, whose Senators the present and the proposed two-thirds cloture rule would permit to block all action, have but 8 percent of the population. The 11 southern and 6 border States have only 33 percent of the population. And the voter participation in most of the Southern States is much less than in the rest of the Nation.

Beyond all this, the House of Representatives, the President with his veto power, and the Supreme Court are all instruments of government that can and do restrain impetuous and improper congressional action.

Mr. Lippmann's example of President Truman's emergency strike legislation hardly strengthens his argument. If 6 days' debate in the Senate stopped the bad features of that bill, as he points out, surely the 8 weeks permitted under our proposal could do the same.

Thus the brakes upon the tyranny of majorities, which Mr. Lippmann fears, are already very substantial. To enshrine the filibuster, as he argues the Senate should do, is to paralyze the Congress in this crucial area of human rights. The bipartisan group working for the change in rule 22 believe, on the contrary, that the time for reasonable but definite action is now, and only if majority rule is restored in the Senate—with all the safeguards I have mentioned—can we hope to carry out our responsibilities to our own citizens and to free peoples everywhere.

Sincerely,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE INTEREST GROUP, SPEECH ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, AT THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING DECEMBER 28, 1958, CONRAD HILTON HOTEL, CHICAGO, ILL.

Whereas the parliamentary procedure interest group of the Speech Association of America is greatly concerned with the processes of free discussion and action by majority will in legislative bodies; and

Whereas, under rule XXII, the filibuster and the threat of filibuster in the U.S. Senate now interfere with free debate and may prevent consideration of and eventual action on proposals, and thus interfere with the democratic functioning of that legislative body; and

Whereas there will be presented in the January session of the 86th Congress proposals for making cloture practically feasible in the Senate; and

Whereas it is recognized that the Senate's rights as a full deliberative body should in no way be infringed, and that any measures for cloture should be designed not to stifle discussion but rather to make possible bringing matters to a vote eventually; therefore

Resolved, That we endorse the statement of the President of the Senate (Jan. 4, 1957) that: "It is the opinion of the Chair that * * * the right of a current majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress to adopt its own rules, stemming as it does from the Constitution itself, cannot be restricted or limited by rules adopted by a majority of the Senate in a previous Congress;" and be it further

Resolved, That we endorse the principle of ending debate by two-thirds of those present and voting, a quorum being present; and be it further

Resolved, That after extensive debate, and due notice, a majority of Senators elected and sworn are sufficient to end debate; and be it further

Resolved, That motions to proceed to consideration of matters, or to change standing rules, should be subject to the same provisions of cloture; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the Senate, and to the President pro tempore.

FILIBUSTER DEBATE

(By Nora R. DeMent)

In his charge against "advanced liberals," William S. White again gets entangled in the transitory issue of civil rights and McCarthyism. The real issue is the fundamental one that this Government, if we are to honor our traditions, must be one which "derives its just powers from the consent of the governed." A government which derives its powers from less than a majority of a Senate quorum is not such a government.

Mr. White says that the Senate was "deliberately designed" to act as a check upon majority rule. He is wrong. The Constitution does not sustain him. He attempts to convert a "power," which the Senate has arrogated to itself, into a "right" which the Constitution does not give it.

The Constitution gives the Senate exclusive jurisdiction in three classes of cases. It ratifies treaties, tries cases of impeachment and confirms certain classes of presidential appointments. In the first two it is required to act by the vote of two-thirds of a quorum; in the third it acts by a majority of a quorum. It is apparent that even in those matters where the Senate exercises sole jurisdiction it has no inclusive duty or right to act by a two-thirds vote of a quorum.

In all other cases the Senate has the same rights and duties as the House. It passes its own legislation by majority vote and acts upon that of the House by the same vote. Both Houses can only override a presidential veto by two-thirds vote; neither can initiate proposals for constitutional amendments except by two-thirds rule.

Those of us who oppose Mr. White are not "advanced liberals"; we are "reactionary fundamentalists." This assumes that "reactionary" means looking backward to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, in this case longingly; and "fundamentalist" means one who believes that the Senate has no right to arrogate a "power" which the Constitution does not give it as a "right."

The American people have lived for 200 years with and under the philosophy of democracy; if they cannot now correctly evaluate its benefits, then there is no way to save them from themselves.

CHARLES M. LAFOLLETTE.

DECEMBER 31, 1958.

BEFORE THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (ACTING AS PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES) IN THE MATTER OF THE VICE PRESIDENT'S DECISION ON MOTION TO TAKE UP RULES

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PROPOSITION THAT MOTION TO TAKE UP RULES OF SENATE OF 86TH CONGRESS IS IN ORDER AND IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Questions presented

1. Whether the motion to be presented by certain Senators on January 7, 1959, to take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress, is in order?

2. Whether the Constitution, and particularly article I, section 5 thereof, authorizes the Senate of each new Congress to determine its own rules?

3. Whether action by the Senate of an earlier Congress can prevent the Senate of the 86th Congress from adopting the rules which the majority of the duly-elected Senators of the 86th Congress believe will best facilitate the business of the Senate and the implementation of the mandate of the electorate?

4. What rules would prevail in the Senate during the consideration of, and prior to the adoption of, rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress?

(The question is not whether the Senate is a continuing or continuous body. As we shall show in this brief, the terms "continuing" and "continuous" are simply adjectives used to convey the fact that two-thirds of the Members of the Senate carry over from Congress to Congress. They are adjectives resulting from this one aspect of the Senate; they are not a cause of anything. The question is not whether the words "continuing" and "continuous" are appropriate adjectives to describe the Senate of the United States, but whether the majority of Senators meeting for the first time in the new Congress have the power to adopt their own rules free from obstructions laid down many years earlier. While we are confident that this brief successfully disproves the general applicability of these adjectives to the Senate,[1] our case does not depend upon proving, as an academic exercise, that those who take comfort in references to the Senate as a continuing or continuous body have used the wrong adjectives. In sum, the question is not whether the Senate is a continuing or continuous body, but whether the majority of the Senate of the 86th Congress may adopt its own rules free of the fetters of earlier senatorial actions and rules.)

Significance of ruling

The decision of the Vice President upon the motion to take up the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress may well prove to be the most significant ruling ever made by a Presiding Officer of the Senate. For the Vice President's ruling may determine whether the Senate of the United States will, in the critical years ahead, be in a position to reflect the views of the majority of its Members and of the people who elected them, or will be chained to inaction by the veto power of an unyielding minority. What is at stake is far more than civil rights legislation, important as that is; what is at stake is the ability of the Senate to function as a democratic and effective legislative body in the interests of justice and peace.

The question that will be placed before the Vice President by the motion to take up rules has never been placed squarely before the Presiding Officer of the Senate, although it has been raised in the past, as in 1917, 1953, and 1957. In each of these instances, which will be discussed at greater length below, the issue was left undecided. No doubt it was because Vice President Barkley was prepared to rule the Anderson motion in order in 1953 (see e.g. Newsweek, Jan. 19, 1953)[2] that no point of order was made

[1] Upon request the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress prepared two briefs (one on each side) prior to the opening of the 85th Congress on Jan. 3, 1957, on the question "Is the Senate a Continuing Body?" While the briefs are helpful on this academic issue, they are not directed at the real questions before the Vice President.

[2] Vice President Barkley was undoubtedly influenced by the brief of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights which was made available to him prior to the opening of Congress in 1953 (see 99 CONGRESSIONAL against the motion and no opportunity was given him to make the ruling in question here. Similarly, Vice President NIXON was prepared to rule in 1957 that the Anderson motion was in order, and no point of order was made against the motion, but the issue was again determined on a motion to table; in a historic advisory opinion, replying to a parliamentary inquiry by Senator HUMPHREY, the Vice President indicated that he believed it was in order for the Senate to proceed to the consideration of rules. Thus, there is no direct precedent presently available to guide the Vice President in reaching his historic decision. He must therefore be guided by the letter and spirit of the Constitution and by the precedents on related issues; so guided he can only reach the decision which accords with the fundamental principle that the living shall determine the destinies of the living and that a democracy rests upon the majority will of the governed.

Statement of facts

The Senate of the 86th Congress will convene at 12 o'clock meridian on January 7, 1959. Immediately after the prayer, the formalities of presenting credentials and administering the oath to new members, and the election of officers, the following motion will be made:

"In accordance with article I, section 5 of the Constitution which declares that '* * * each House may determine the rules of its proceedings * * *,' I now move that this body take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress."

Consideration has been given to presenting the motion to take up rules before the election of officers and other routine business. We have, nevertheless, deemed it appropriate to withhold the motion to take up the rules until the officers have been elected. This order of proceeding would appear to be in the interest of the organization and expeditious operation of the Senate. It has been the order of proceeding generally in the House of Representatives. It is also the procedure that was followed in 1953 and 1957. Furthermore, in 1953 Vice President Barkley, after the election of officers had been completed, answered a query as to the rules governing the election with the statement that "the organization of the Senate is an inherent right of the Senate, as it is of any sovereign body, and all that has taken place up to date has been under that inherent right" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10). In the same vein, Senator Taft stated that "it is fair to say that none of the matters that have been acted on today have been taken up under the provisions of any particular rules * * *" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10). In light of these considerations, we do not believe that proceeding to the election of officers could possibly constitute an acquiescence in the rules of the Senate of the 85th Congress or a waiver of the right to move to take up the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress. The brief submitted to the Vice President prior to the opening of the 85th Congress requested that, if he should not agree with this analysis and the proposed timing of the motion to take up rules, he so indicate before January 3. He did not do so and the motion was made as indicated. As it is the intention of the Senators joining in the motion to adopt rules again to follow this procedure, the Vice President is again requested that, should he disagree with the proposed timing and the analysis upon which it is based, he indicate such disagreement before January 7, 1959.

Once the motion to take up rules has been made, those supporting the filibuster and opposing new rules may either: (a) Raise a point of order against the motion; or (b) move to table it, first allowing reasonable debate as Senator JOHNSON of Texas did in 1957, and Senator Taft did in 1953.[3]

If those opposing the motion raise a point of order against the motion on the ground that the Senate of the 86th Congress already has rules (carried over from the Senate of the previous Congress), the Vice President will be called upon to make a ruling upon the question whether the old rules carry over to the Senate of the 86th Congress.[4] Actually, such a point of order rather than a motion to table would appear to be the appropriate method of determining whether the old rules carry over to the Senate of the 86th Congress. For such a motion would clearly put the issue to the Senate which, as the Vice President has pointed out, is the final arbiter on questions of constitutionality (103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 178). The motion to table does do this in an indirect fashion, as was pointed out by the Vice President in 1957,[5] though it may still leave open the final constitutional issue which must be determined by the Senate itself.[6]

If the motion to take up rules is held in order and is then adopted by the Senate, a motion will be made to adopt, as the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress, the old rules with a revised rule XXII. The new rule XXII might well be that reported to the Senate by the Committee on Rules and Administration on April 30, 1958, in Senate Resolution 17 (S. Rept. 1509) which provides for a limitation on debate if, after 2 days' notice, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting supported cloture or if, after 15 days' notice (exclusive of Sunday and legal holidays), a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn supported cloture (i.e., 50 Senators, now that Alaska is represented in the Senate). This proposal would permit prompt action on emergency measures supported by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, while, at the same time, it would assure full, free, and even prolonged debate on legislation (including debate on the motion to take up, a minimum of 5 weeks and normally 8 weeks) before a majority of Senators duly chosen and sworn could obtain cloture. An alternative would be to allow cloture after 15 days' notice upon a majority vote of the Senators present and voting. Other alternatives the Senate will possibly have presented to it are to allow cloture only by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, or by 60 percent of the Senators present and voting, or to retain the existing rule XXII or even to do away with cloture entirely (i.e., recognize the practicalities of the existing situation). All the proposals for a new rule XXII that have been made allow full debate before cloture can be applied and all Senators supporting the motion to take up rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress are strongly committed to the proposition that cloture should only be applied after full debate.

But the question as to which cloture rule will ultimately be adopted is irrelevant to the question whether the motion to take up rules is in order. What is at issue here is the power of a majority of the Senators of the 86th Congress to make the decision on the rules that will bind them in their work in that Congress. The existence of that power is clear. It resides in the Constitution itself.

ARGUMENT I

The majority of the Senate in each Congress has a constitutional right to adopt rules of proceedings for the Senate of that Congress unfettered by action or rules of the Senate of any preceding Congress

Article I, section 5 of the Constitution of the United States declares that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Although there are no directly relevant judicial or legislative precedents interpreting this provision of the Constitution, it seems quite clear from the language and context that "each House" means not only the separate branches of the Congress—that is, the House and the Senate—but also the separate branches of each succeeding Congress. No reason has been or can be adduced to interpret this constitutional provision as a grant of rulemaking authority to the Members of the House and the Senate meeting for the first time in 1789 and a withholding of this RECORD 181–201). A similar brief was submitted to the present occupant of the chair, Vice President NIXON, prior to the opening of the 85th Cong. in 1957 (see 103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 24). These briefs were probably the most complete studies ever made of the power of the Senate of a new Congress to adopt its own rules unfettered by the actions or rules of the Senate of any preceding Congress. We urge the Vice President to give careful consideration to these briefs. We have borrowed liberally from these documents in the preparation of this brief.

[3] Both Senators JOHNSON and Taft provided for a vote on the motions to table only after substantial debate on the motion to take up rules had been permitted. In 1953 this was done by postponing the actual motion until debate had taken place, while in 1957, Senator JOHNSON submitted a unanimous consent agreement providing for 6 hours of debate on the motion to table.

[4] Although it would be technically possible for the Vice President to avoid a ruling by placing the point of order before the Senate for a vote without rendering a decision upon the point of order himself, it is not believed that the Vice President, acting in his constitutional role as President of the Senate, would deprive the body of guidance from its presiding officer on so vital and significant an issue, particularly in view of the outstanding guidance provided in this matter in his advisory opinion of January 4, 1957.

[5] The Vice President stated as follows:

"At the beginning of a session in a newly elected Congress, the Senate can indicate its will in regard to its rules in one of three ways:

"First. It can proceed to conduct its business under the Senate rules which were in effect in the previous Congress and thereby indicate by acquiescence that those rules continue in effect. This has been the practice in the past.

"Second. It can vote negatively when a motion is made to adopt new rules and by such action indicate approval of the previous rules.

"Third. It can vote affirmatively to proceed with the adoption of new rules.

"If the motion to table should prevail, a majority of the Senate by such action would have indicated its approval of the previous rules of the Senate, and those rules would be binding on the Senate for the remainder of this Congress unless subsequently changed under those rules.

"If, on the other hand, the motion to lay on the table shall fail, the Senate can proceed with the adoption of rules under whatever procedures the majority of the Senate approves."

[6] If the motion to take up rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress is tabled, it will still be open to Senators to raise the question whether the rules of the earlier Congresses carry over to the Senate of the 86th Congress. After tabling, a Senator might arise and ask the Vice President to state under what rules the Senate was proceeding; one side or the other could then appeal from the Vice President's ruling. Another method of accomplishing the same result would be for a Senator to make a point of order against a particular action of the Senate under the old rules on the ground that they did not carry over and then either side could appeal from a ruling on that point of order.

same authority from the Members of the House and the Senate of later Congresses. Both language and logic lead to the conclusion that the constitutional authority to make rules is granted to each House of each Congress.

The Vice President clearly pointed this out in his advisory opinion in response to Senator HUMPHREY'S parliamentary inquiry of January 4, 1957, although this, too, as was pointed out at the time, is in the nature of dictum (103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10). He stated:

"The Constitution also provides that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.' This constitutional right is lodged in the membership of the Senate and it may be exercised by a majority of the Senate at any time. When the membership of the Senate changes, as it does upon the election of each Congress, it is the Chair's opinion that there can be no question that the majority of the new existing membership of the Senate, under the Constitution, have the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed.

"It is the opinion of the Chair that while the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another, the right of a current majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress to adopt its own rules, stemming as it does from the Constitution itself, cannot be restricted or limited by rules adopted by a majority of the Senate in a previous Congress.

"Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule 22 in practice has such an effect."

It is significant that article I, section 5, is an identical grant of rulemaking authority to each House of Congress. It is not disputed that the House of Representatives of each new Congress has the power to, and does, adopt new rules at the opening of each Congress (see point V). The identical constitutional provision cannot reasonably be given a different interpretation as applied to the Senate, a coordinate branch of the Congress of the United States (art. I, sec. 1). For not only do the two bodies act as a team in the Congress, but the rulemaking authority of the House can be rendered meaningless if the Senate is not also in a position to adopt rules that will make possible the expression of the majority will of the Senate and thus of the Congress.

Every principle of constitutional construction supports the interpretation of article I, section 5, which gives the majority of the Senate present on January 7, 1959, the right to "determine the rules of its proceedings" unfettered by action or rules of the Senate of any preceding Congress. The Constitution of the United States should be interpreted in the light of the intention of its framers to build a democratic government reflecting the will of the governed not only for the day but for an enduring future. What Chief Justice Marshall said in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316, 415), of the congressional power to pass "unnecessary and proper" legislation, is equally applicable to its power to make its own rules without the impediments of the past:

"The subject is the execution of those great powers on which the welfare of a nation essentially depends. It must have been the intention of those who gave these powers, to insure, as far as human prudence could insure, their beneficial execution. This could not be done by confiding the choice of means to such narrow limits as not to leave it in the power of Congress to adopt any which might be appropriate, and which were conducive to the end. This provision is made in a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs. To have prescribed the means by which government should, in all future time, execute its powers, would have been to change, entirely, the character of the instrument, and give it the properties of a legal code. It would have been an unwise attempt to provide, by immutable rules, for exigencies which, if foreseen at all, must have been seen dimly, and which can be best provided for as they occur. To have declared that the best means shall not be used, but those alone without which the power given would be nugatory, would have been to deprive the legislature of the capacity to avail itself of experience, to exercise its reason, and to accommodate its legislation to circumstances."

The suggestion that rules enacted by men long since dead or retired from public life should prevent the majority of the Senate of the Eighty-sixth Congress from adopting its own rules is contrary to the very spirit of democracy upon which the Constitution is predicated. There is no more basic principle of democracy than that the living shall determine their own destinies unhampered by the dead hand of the past. It becomes an absurdity to argue that rules adopted years or even generations earlier can bind new Senators who are elected on pledges to particular programs which the old rules make impossible.

We cannot state this proposition as well as Thomas Jefferson did many years ago:

"Can one generation bind another, and all others, in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead. * * * A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent unalienable rights of man." (The Jefferson Cyclopedia, vol. VII, pp. 377, 378.)

As one generation cannot bind another, so one legislature cannot bind its successor. This fundamental principle of the independence and full authority of each new legislature, recognized by all authorities, has been well stated by Judge Cooley ("Constitutional Limitations," 6th ed., 1890, pp. 146–147):

"To say that the Legislature may pass irrepealable laws, is to say that it may alter the very constitution from which it derives its authority; since, insofar as one legislature could bind a subsequent one by its enactments, it could in the same degree reduce the legislative power of its successors; and the process might be repeated until, one by one, the subjects of legislation would be excluded altogether from their control, and the constitutional provision that the legislative power shall be vested in two Houses would be to a greater or less degree rendered ineffectual."

The inherent right of legislative bodies to be unfettered by previous assemblies has been forcefully recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in cases dating back over a long period. This right, as analyzed by the Supreme Court, does not arise from any particular phraseology in Federal and State constitutions; it arises from the very nature of successive legislatures in a democratic society .

In one of the leading cases dealing with this problem, the Supreme Court stated:

"Every succeeding legislature possesses the same jurisdiction and power with respect to them as its predecessors. The latter have the same power of repeal and modification which the former had of enactment, neither more nor less. All occupy, in this respect, a footing of perfect equality. This must necessarily be so in the nature of things. It is vital to the public welfare that each one should be able at all times to do whatever the varying circumstances and present exigencies touching the subject involved may require. A different result would be fraught with evil" (Newton v. Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio (100 U.S. 548, 559)).

Again, in response to the argument that Congress could not change the use of certain public lands, Mr. Justice (later Chief Justice) Stone said:

"By dedicating the lands thus acquired to a particular public use, Congress declared a public policy, but did not purport to deprive itself of the power to change that policy by devoting the lands to other uses. The dedication expressed no more than the will of a particular Congress which does not impose itself upon those to follow in succeeding years. See Newton v. Mahoning County Commissioners (100 U.S. 548, 559); Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Spratley (172 U.S. 602, 621)." Reichelderfer v. Quinn (287 U.S. 315, 318).

This principle, that no legislature can act so as to fetter its successors in expressing public policy and public will, has been repeatedly expressed. See Town of East Hartford v. Hartford Bridge Co. (10 How. 511, 533); Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Co. v. Debolt (16 How. 416, 431); Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Spratley (172 U.S. 602, 621); Toomer v. Witsell (334 U.S. 385, 393 (n. 19)). Who would maintain that, for example, if the Congress enacts a law providing that it can be repealed only by a two-thirds vote, that a majority could not subsequently repeal both that provision and the law itself by a simple majority? Such a theory would be the first, irreversible step toward the destruction of democratic government. Yet this is the very argument which is being made by those who would assert the permanency of the rules.

Article I, section 5 of the Constitution, empowering each House to "determine the rules of its proceedings" must be interpreted in the light of these fundamental democratic principles upon which the Constitution is based; so interpreted, it can only be read to give each branch of each succeeding Congress the same power of making its own rules that the branches of the first Congress had when they met in 1789. Any other interpretation would lead to the antidemocratic formulation that one legislature, whose members were long since dead and gone, could prevent action by the duly elected and existing representatives of the people. This, as we have seen, cannot be done.

What we have here is a clear illustration of the evils inherent in the members of a legislative body seeking to bind their successors. What we have here is not simply a rule of the past whose incidental effect is to bind the present and the future; what we have here a purposeful effort to restrict the authority of future Congresses by preventing changes in the rules. Clause 3 of the Hayden-Wherry resolution of 1949, which amended rule XXII, provides that there shall be no cloture whatever on any proposal to change the rules of the Senate. The Senate of the 81st Congress thus attempted to fasten its will on the Senate of all future Congresses; it attempted to perpetuate the present rule XXII for all time. This was not a simple effort to provide rules for the Senate's own governance, but was rather a deliberate attempt to foist those rules upon the Senate of all future Congresses. As Senator RUSSELL so aptly said of clause 3, "the rules of the Senate hereafter are not subject to cloture on a motion to proceed to the consideration of a change in the standing rules . . . it [clause 3] permits Senators who have the courage to do so to protect the parliamentary integrity of this body from assaults that will come in the days that lie ahead." (Vol. 95 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD p. 2722.) See also CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, pages 2230, 2415, 2582–2584, 2673–2675. Clause 3 was, in a word, a deliberate effort boldly stated to flout the basic principle that the Members of one Congress cannot bind their successors. It cannot be that such a stratagem has effectively given a minority of Senators a perpetual veto power over the national legislative process. The Vice President's advisory opinion clearly stated his belief that clause 3 was unconstitutional.

It might be helpful and clarifying to consider some other possible courses that the Senate of the 81st Congress might have followed to perpetuate rule XXII. Suppose that, instead of adopting clause 3 of rule XXII, the Hayden-Wherry resolution had provided that rules of the Senate "may be amended hereafter only by unanimous consent." Certainly no one would contend that the Senators meeting on January 7, 1959, would be bound by any such rule and yet this is exactly the purpose and effect of clause 3 of rule XXII. As long as there is one Senator on his feet and ready to talk, there can be no change in the rules of the Senate. There is little difference between substance, the only effect of which is to create a certain result, and the actual form. When the practical effect of a provision is unconstitutional, it does not matter that the draftsmen have carefully avoided a clear expression thereof.

Or let us take a second case. Suppose the Senate in 1949 instead of enacting clause 3 of rule XXII had adopted a rule that no "equal rights" legislation could be considered for 25 years or some other terms of years. Again no one would dream of arguing that this rule would bind a majority of the Senate of the incoming 86th Congress. Yet, again as a practical matter, that is exactly the purpose and effect of the action of the Senate of 1949.

The Senate of 1949, by clause 3 of rule XXII, tried to bind the future just as much as if had required unanimous consent to any change in the rules or had provided that the Senate of no future Congress could take up "equal rights" legislation. Its efforts to prevent the Senate from responding to the will of the people cannot succeed under the authorities cited and principles outlined above.

Rule XXII is substance masquerading as procedure. Rules are generally intended to facilitate the conduct of business, not to prevent it. The purpose of rules is to facilitate and provide, by orderly procedures, what a legislative body desires to do; a rule which defeats the purpose for which rules are established is hostile to democratic processes.

Rule XXII is not a procedural means of getting business done; it is a substantive means of preventing business from being done.

It is a means of the Senate of one Congress seeking to bind its successors to its own rules and its own inaction.

It is means of keeping the majority of the Senate and of the people from determining vital substantive issues.

The answer to this attempt to bind the future lies in article I, section 5, which gives the majority of the Senate of the 86th Congress, meeting for the first time on January 7, 1959, the power and the duty to make its own rules, unfettered by efforts of the Senate of an earlier Congress to deprive this majority of its constitutional power and responsibility. Rules adopted by Senators long departed cannot prejudice the explicit constitutional authority in article I, section 5.

II. The four closest precedents in the history of the Senate all support the proposition that a majority of the Senate of a new Congress can act to adopt its own rules without the obstruction of actions and rules of the Senate of an earlier Congress

A. Precedent 1—The Dismissal of the Senate Printer in 1841

A joint resolution of 1819 authorized each House of Congress to chose the Printer for the next succeeding House; it provided the method, rights of pay, and other matters of detail. Pursuant to this joint resolution, the Democratic Senate in 1840 chose as printer for the Senate of the following Congress (the 27th Congress) the firm of Blair & Rives. Mr. Blair was editor of the Washington Globe, an intensely partisan newspaper which supported the Democratic administration. The Whigs had given notice during the last days of the second session of the 26th Congress that they did not consider that the Democrats had any constitutional or moral right to choose a printer for the next Congress. Despite these warnings, the Democratic Senate awarded the contract for the printing for the next Senate to Blair & Rives.

Immediately upon the opening of a special session of the Whig-controlled 27th Congress, Senator Mangum of North Carolina introduced a resolution that Blair & Rives be dismissed as Printer to the Senate (9 Congressional Globe, p. 236). The resolution was heatedly opposed, largely on the authority of the established usage under the Joint Resolution of 1819. The opponents argued that a printer had been elected 10 times under the authority of the resolution and that now, on the occasion of the 11th election, the unconstitutionality of the authorizing resolution was claimed too late. Senator Allen of Ohio, in a statement quoted several times during the 1953 Senate debates, summed up the position of those contending for the binding effect of the action of the previous Senate in these words:

"And as to the assertion that this was a new Senate, he denied the fact. * * * There was no such thing as a new Senate known to the Constitution of this Republic. They might as well speak of a new Supreme Court as of a new Senate."

Senator Buchanan and others supported Senator Allen, arguing for the theory of the Senate as a permanent and continuous body bound by the actions of the Senate of an earlier Congress.

Rejecting the appeals of Senators Allen, Buchanan, and the other Democrats, those in favor of the dismissal of the Printer designated the resolution of 1819 as a nullity because it attempted to bind the actions of future Houses of Congress. The argument that the Senate of one Congress could not bind its successors prevailed; the resolution to dismiss the Printer was adopted 26 to 18.

In a word, the Senate of 1841 rejected the theory that the action of the Senate of one Congress could bind the Senate of a later Congress. The Senate rejected this theory in the face of the same arguments of permanence and continuity that are now being made by the supporters of rule XXII. Indeed, it is significant that Senator Taft, leading the battle against the Anderson motion in 1953, relied heavily upon the quotation from Senator Allen in the 1841 debate, despite the fact that Senator Allen's statement and his theory had been repudiated by a majority of the Senate when it voted to dismiss the Printer. In other words, those who relied upon the statements of Senators Allen, Buchanan, and their colleagues were relying upon the arguments of the defeated side; it was as though, in arguing to a court, a lawyer had relied upon a decision that had been overruled.

B. Precedent 2—Abrogation of the Joint Rules in 1876

The story of the abrogation of the Joint Rules and their relevance to the present issue was well stated in the Leadership Conference Brief (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 187), and quoted in the 1957 brief submitted by Senators joining in the motion to take up rules (103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 24, 26). We again quote that statement in full:

"In the first Congress the Senate and House adopted joint rules to govern the relationship and necessary business between them. Annals of Congress, 57–58, 987. Thereafter, these joint rules of the two Houses were treated as in force and revised and amended, although the Senate and House did not adopt them at the beginning of each Congress.

"In 1865, rule XXII of the joint rules was adopted in an attempt to settle the long-standing controversy on the method of counting electoral votes. In 1869, there was a violent quarrel between the two Houses of Congress over the effect of this particular joint rule. This led to a determination by a portion of the Senate to rescind that rule, in anticipation of any problems over the counting of electoral votes which might arise from the 1876 Presidential election (Haynes, op. cit. supra, p. 245 et seq.) The desire of the Senate to eliminate joint rule XXII led to the end of acquiescence of each new Senate in the continuation of the joint rules and the Senate in the 1st session of the 41st Congress, after 87 years of unbroken historical usage, demonstrated its right to adopt new joint rules at the beginning of each new Congress.

"On December 15, Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, introduced a resolution to adopt the joint rules in force at the close of the last session of Congress. Senator Bayard, of Delaware, asked whether this was necessary, and Senator Edmunds answered:

" 'That, as a celebrated Englishman said, is past finding out. The object of this resolution is to ascertain from the proper Committee on Rules (which had jurisdiction over the joint rules as well as the Standing Rules of the Senate) whether the joint rules that were in force at the last session of Congress are in force now without any vote; and, if so, upon what principle of law or joint proceeding; and, if not, of course to take some steps to have some joint rules between the two Houses' (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 220).

"The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, which reported it back favorably with a technical amendment making it a concurrent resolution. Senator Hamlin argued that the joint rules operated only by acquiescence (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 309). Considerable heated discussion ensued, in which widely different theories as to the effect and validity of the joint rules were stated. The one point receiving constant reiteration was that the joint rules had operated by acquiescence, and must be subject to change. Senator Hamlin, as he gave the committee report, stated it as follows:

" 'It is only by acquiescence in long years that they have been treated and regarded as rules, and not by an affirmative vote either of the House or of the Senate' (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 309).

"Recognition that common consent or acquiescence could give validity to that which was otherwise doubtful only so long as the acquiescence continued was voiced by Senator Merrimon, who said in the course of this debate (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 431–432):

" 'It seems, as the venerable Senator from Maine, Mr. Hamlin, stated on a former occasion, that this matter has passed uniformly from the beginning of the Government down to this time without question. The question is now raised, and if today some action of Congress should be required under the joint rules, and a Senator should rise and say "I object," there would be the end of it. It is only by common consent that the practice to which I have referred has prevailed.'

"Despite the appeals to history, long-standing practice, and the venerability of the joint rules, the Senate voted to reject a substitute resolution which would have treated the rules as in force and provided for an amendment of those rules, and accepted the initial resolution which was framed on the theory that no joint rules existed at the opening of the new Congress (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 519).

"Thus, the Senate passed a concurrent resolution adopting the joint rules anew for the 44th Congress. The House never passed this resolution. The Senate, at various times since then has made an effort to have joint rules passed but they never have succeeded (Gilfrey, "Precedents," 1914, p. P-441; Hinds, sections 6782-6787). In most respects the House and Senate now operate in the same manner as they did under the joint rules on some theory of usage.

"The decision, by vote of the Senate, that the joint rules were not in effect demonstrated that the joint rules had existed only by acquiescence and that the acquiescence of even 87 years was in no way binding when a majority manifested its will to the contrary. It also showed conclusively that the method by which the majority in such a situation manifests its will is by the adoption of new rules and not by amendment of the old ones."

C. Precedent 3—Senator Walsh's Resolution and Arguments in 1917

At the opening of the 65th Congress in March 1917, Senators Owen of Oklahoma and Walsh of Montana raised the question whether the rules of the preceding Senate were binding upon the new body.

Senator Owen, on the first business day of the Senate of the new Congress, March 6, 1917, refused to permit a bill to be referred to committee on the ground that committees were not in existence at the beginning of this new Congress, and Senator Walsh supported Senator Owen's contention.

On March 7, Senator Walsh presented a resolution squarely raising the issue whether the rules carried over from Senate to Senate and presented his now famous argument against the old rules being applied to the Senate of the new Congress. Said the Senator: "A majority may adopt the rules in th first place. It is preposterous to assert that they may deny to future majorities the right to change them."

On the evening of March 7, after Senator Walsh's resolution and speech, caucuses of both parties voted to approve a change in rule XXII to provide for cloture by a two-thirds vote. The resolution was debated by unanimous consent without ever being referred to committee and was adopted on March 8, 1917 (76 yeas, 3 nays). Senator Walsh, who had accomplished his purpose of obtaining the cloture rule he sought, dropped his resolution.

D. Precedent 4—Vice President NIXON's Advisory Opinion in 1957

At the opening of the 85th Congress on January 3, 1957, Senator ANDERSON and others again raised the question of whether the Senate had any rules in effect at this time. The events following Senator ANDERSON's motion to adopt rules are discussed in detail elsewhere in this brief and need not be repeated here.

On January 4, Senator HUMPHREY squarely raised the issue of whether the rules continue from one Congress to another by asking in a parliamentary inquiry "* * * under what rule is the Senate presently proceeding?" In response, the Vice President rendered his historic opinion, previously quoted in this brief, that the Senate, at the beginning of each Congress, has the power to adopt rules and that it has in effect done so, albeit by acquiescence in the rules of the previous Congress.

Although Senator JOHNSON's motion to table Senator ANDERSON's motion was successful on a vote, this was clearly no repudiation of the Vice President's opinion, since this contingency had been taken into consideration when the Vice President stated:

"Turning to the parliamentary situation in which the Senate now finds itself, if the motion to table should prevail, a majority of the Senate by such action will have indicated its approval of the previous rules of the Senate. * * *

"If, on the other hand, the motion to lay on the table fails, the Senate can proceed with the adoption of rules under whatever procedure the majority of the Senate approves."

There was no challenge to this evaluation of the parliamentary situation in the debate following the Vice President's opinion, although there was ample opportunity to do so, either in the debate itself or by making a point of order against the motion to adopt rules which would have placed the issue squarely before the Senate. Silence on this point may well be taken as tacit acceptance of this principle.

* * * * *

Thus, in the four closest precedents, the Senate, while some of its Members talked continuous body and others talked in a contrary vein, each time supported the right of the Senate to adopt new rules. The printer was dismissed despite the argument that this could not be done in the face of the action of the Senate of the earlier Congress; new joint rules were adopted despite the action and acquiescence of the Senate of the earlier Congresses; a new cloture rule was adopted by overwhelming agreement once the argument was made that the old rules did not carry over; and the Vice President's advisory opinion was received by the Senate, without challenge in subsequent debate.

The action of the Senate in 1953 and 1957, while admittedly not free from ambiguity, would also appear to be favorable precedents.

On January 3, 1953, Senator ANDERSON on behalf of himself and 18 other Senators moved that the Senate take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 83d Congress. If, in fact, the rules of the Senate of the earlier Congress had automatically carried over, this motion was out of order. Yet not a single member of the majority opposing the motion to take up rules raised a point of order against the motion, despite the fact that this would have been the proper parliamentary procedure if the group had cared to test out the question whether the old rules carried over. Instead of a point of order, the then majority leader, Senator Taft, moved to lay the motion on the table, an implicit recognition of the fact that the motion had been in order. Many Senators undoubtedly voted for the tabling motion because they sought to avoid any direct issue on the rules at that time, even thought they would have supported a ruling by the Vice President that the resolution was in order.[7] Indeed, one such Senator, Senator Potter, stated subsequently that he voted to table because he did not want anything to interfere with the organization of the new administration and the confirmation of the new cabinet. New York Times, December 12, 1956, page 31. No such issue is presently before the Senate.

[7] It is generally believed that such a ruling would have been forthcoming had a point of order been raised and the Vice President given the opportunity to rule. Actually Vice President Barkley made a partial ruling to this effect when he stated, in connection with the election of officers, that "the organization of the Senate is an inherent right of the Senate, as it is of any sovereign body, and all that has taken place up to date has been under that inherent right" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10). Had the rules actually carried over from the previous Congress, the election of officers would have taken place under these rules, not under "inherent right."

The effect of the motion to table was well stated by Senator Lehman at the conclusion of the debate in 1953:

"The adoption of the motion to table the resolution of the Senator from New Mexico is implicit recognition of the fact that our main contention that each Senate has the constitutional right to adopt its own rules is sound.[8] No point of order was raised against the Anderson motion. A majority of the Senate has laid that motion on the table. I believe the opposition did not dare to raise a point of order because of the fear that such a point against the Anderson motion would have been overruled. * * * I believe it to be an incontrovertible fact that the Senate has the constitutional right—even the obligation—to adopt its own rules at the beginning of a new Congress. It is incontrovertible because the right to do so is expressly set forth in the Constitution. It is, moreover, basically inherent in the nature of a democratic parliamentary body" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 232).

On January 3, 1957, Senator Anderson made a similar motion on behalf of himself and 30 other Senators, and the ensuing events closely paralleled those of 1953. Thus the same implications stated by Senator Lehman to apply to the 1953 motion to table apply equally to the 1957 motion. They both demonstrate that the opposition did not wish to face that issue.

III. The Senate of each new Congress makes a fresh start on all activities; it has a right to make a fresh start on its rules

In every major activity the Senate recognizes a constitutional right of the Senate of each new Congress to determine both legislative and executive business anew. All consideration of bills,[9] resolutions, treaties and nominations starts at the beginning of each Congress without reference to or continuation of what has taken place in the past; new officers and committee members are elected in the Senate of each new Congress; when the Senate finally adjourns, the slate is wiped clean; the proceedings begin again in the next Congress.

For convenience, we present the following analysis of the operations of the U.S. Senate in tabular form.

[8] Senator LEHMAN's interpretation of the action of the Senate in 1953 appears to be more accurate than that contained in the Watkins committee report in 1954. Furthermore, the entire discussion of the question of continuing body in the Watkins report was irrelevant to its conclusion that a Senator can properly be censured for actions occurring during a prior term as Senator. The Senate's power to censure arises from the necessity of maintaining the dignity and good repute of the Senate, and, therefore, the authority to censure exists as long as a Senator is a Member of the Senate and exists by virtue of his presence in the Senate. Indeed, the same rule that past conduct may be considered for censure and expulsion purposes applied in the House (2 Hinds, Precedents, sec. 1286; H. Rept. No. 570, 63d Cong., 2d sess., 1914), whose rules do not carry over from Congress to Congress.

[9] As was well said in the 1957 brief of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, in referring to the fact that no action in connection with bills carries over from the Senate of one Congress to the Senate of the next Congress:

"This necessary practice is not grounded upon a rule only but upon art. I, sec. 1, of the Constitution of the United States which vests all legislative power in the Congress. As the legislative business of one Congress cannot carry over to a subsequent Congress, a fortiori, the legislative business of one part of the Congress cannot carry over to that part of a subsequent Congress."

Analysis of the operations of the U.S. Senate

Activity	Senate acts anew in each Congress	Senate carries over from Senate of preceding Congress	Comment
1. Introduction of bills	X		See Senate rule XXXII.
2. Committee consideration of bills.	X		Do.
3. Debate on bills	X		Do.
4. Voting on bills	X		Do.
5. Election of officers	X		While the old officers carry over until new ones are elected, the carryover does not prove rules carry over. It is a mere convenience. Even in the House, the Clerk carries over until the new one is elected. Obviously this does not prove that House rules carry over; they do not.[1]
6. Consideration of validity of senatorial elections.	X		Although credentials of a Senator-elect are often presented to the Senate prior to the beginning of his term, the validity of the credentials can only be considered by the Senate to which he was elected and not before.
7. Consideration of treaties	X		See Senate rule XXXVII(2).
8. Submission and consideration of nominations.	X		See Senate rule XXXVIII(6).
9. Election of committee members.	X		See rule XXV. While old committees carry over until new ones are elected, the carryover does not prove rules carry over. It is a mere convenience. Even in the House, the Clerk carries over until the new one is elected. Obviously this does not prove that House rules carry over; they do not.
10. Adjournment	X		Adjourns sine die. When Congress ends at noon of a particular day, and a special session of the Senate of the new Congress is called, the Senate adjourns at noon, and 1 minute afterward opens the new session.
11. Rules	?	?	Past practice of Senate on rules is ambiguous. It can be explained as acquiescence in past rules, which can either be repeated at the opening of the Senate of any new Congress by beginning to operate under them or which can be refused by the adoption of new rules.

[1] Similarly, the fact that the President pro tempore carries over until there is a change of party control of the Senate is no evidence of rules carryover. On the contrary, the fact that an election of a President pro tempore automatically follows a shift in party control (see 99 Congressional Record 9, Jan. 3, 1953) is evidence that the Senate of each new Congress responds to the will of the majority of the Senate of that Congress.

The thing that stands out in the above analysis is that everything starts afresh with the possible exception of the rules.[10] And these, too, it is submitted start afresh the moment a majority of the Senators at the opening of the Senate of a new Congress so will it and so vote. All that has happened over the past years is that there has been acquiescence in the carryover of rules of the Senate from Congress to Congress.[11] Carryover of the rules based on acquiescence is certainly no precedent for carryover in the absence of acquiescence. Absent acquiescence, the rules do not carry over and the Senate of the new Congress must adopt new rules or readopt the old. The acquiescence will be ruptured and will end by the motion to take up new rules on January 7, 1959.

[10] It has been suggested that the very fact that the Senate rules referred to in the above analysis provide that Senate bills, resolutions, treaties, nominations, etc., start afresh is evidence that, in the absence of these rules, Senate activities and business would not start afresh. There are several answers to this suggestion: (i) The rules codified rather than reversed existing practice. (ii) At least with respect to legislative business, starting afresh is a constitutional necessity. See note 9, supra. (iii) Senate rule XXXII provides for the continuation of legislative business from session to session of the same Congress; the existence of this rule hardly proves that the opposite would be true in the absence of rule XXXII. No more does the existence of the various rules providing that Senate business and activities start afresh in a new Congress prove that the opposite would be true in the absence of these rules.

[11] Except, of course, in 1917, when Senators Walsh and Owen refused to acquiesce until the Senate adopted the cloture rule they sought, and in 1953 and 1957 when Senators joining in the Anderson motion refused to do so and the Senate, in voting to table the motions, indicated its acquiescence in the old rules.

IV. The talk about the Senate being a continuing body is both misleading and irrelevant; whether or not the Senate is properly termed a continuous body as an academic matter does not determine whether a majority of the Senate of the 86th Congress may adopt its own rules unobstructed by the actions and rules of the Senate of earlier Congresses

As we have seen in points II and III, the Senate has not in the past acted as a continuous body.

It did not act as a continuous body in 1841 when it dismissed the printer chosen by the Senate of the earlier Congress; it did not act as a continuous body in 1876 when it adopted new joint rules; and it did not act as a continuous body in 1917 when it yielded to the contrary arguments of Senator Walsh and adopted the cloture rule he demanded; and it did not act as a continuing body in 1953 and 1957 when it proceeded under motions to adopt rules, in voting to table (point II).

It does not today act as a continuous body; it wipes the slate clean on bills, resolutions, treaties and nominations at the beginning of each new Congress (point III).

It would be circular reasoning indeed to argue that, despite these actions, the Senate is a continuous body because it has acquiesced in the carryover of rules in the past and is now bound to continue to acquiesce in the carryover of rules because it is a continuous body.

No one would deny that many Senators have talked in terms of a continuous body and that textbook writers have accepted this talk in their academic works. But the talk has been largely by those who tried—unsuccessfully—to use the phrase to prevent Senate action departing from that of the Senate of an earlier Congress and who have failed in their efforts.[12]

[12] We have already seen (point II, A) how Senator Taft and others quoted Senator Allen and his colleagues who were on the losing side in the 1841 debate over the dismissal of the printer.

The essence of the matter, of course, is that the term "continuous" is an adjective resulting from the two-thirds carryover of Senators, not a cause of anything. Also, it can be appropriate when considering one aspect of the Senate and inappropriate when considering another. The adjective may, for example, be well used when it is simply meant to convey the fact that two-thirds of the Members of the Senate carry over to the succeeding Congress; but, equally clearly, the adjective "continuing" is inappropriate when it is intended to convey the idea of a body which wipes the slate clean in regard to bills, treaties, nominations, etc. (see point III). But whether or not the term "continuing" is a good or a bad adjective,[13] it has not been a successful adjective when utilized against concrete proposed action. It cannot prevail over article I, section 5 of the Constitution empowering each House "to determine the rules of its proceedings" nor sanction a device by which the Senate of a previous Congress attempted to fasten its will upon the future. Whether the Senate be continuous or not for other purposes, its bylaws (rules) are void where they conflict with its charter (Constitution). If, by saying that the Senate is a continuous body, it is intended to assert that the rules of yesterday can bind the Senate of the Congress of today, the simple answer is that the first obligation of the Senate is not to its rules but to the people and the Constitution from whence its power derives. There cannot be a constitutional obligation of this House to observe rules whose purpose and effect is to deprive it of its constitutional right to make its own rules. The Vice President considered this issue in his 1957 opinion, indicating his belief that "at least for some purposes" the Senate is a continuing body, but that for others, such as the continuation of the rules, it may not be.

Actually, parliamentary bodies generally have both continuous and discontinuous aspects. The House of Representatives, as we shall show in point V, has continuous aspects and yet no one refers to it as a continuous body and no one disputes its right to adopt new rules at the beginning of each Congress. By the same token, the Senate has both continuous and discontinuous aspects; its limited continuous aspects do not support the proposition that its rules carry over to the Senate of a new Congress if a majority of the Senators desire to adopt new rules.

[13] The passing reference to the Senate as a continuing body in McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U.S. 135), is much discussed and little analyzed. That case involved an investigation into the malfeasance of Attorney General Daugherty, which was begun in the 68th Congress, and the validity of a subpena to the Attorney General's brother which had been issued during the life of that Congress. Before the Supreme Court handed down its decision, the 68th Congress had expired. In considering whether the case had become moot as a result of this fact, the Supreme Court pointed out that the Senate could now revive the committee "by a motion to that effect" and therefore there was a potential need for the information sought from Daugherty. All the Court held was that the Senate had power to revive a committee started in one Congress by action taken by the Senate in the next Congress. This decision did not involve the determination that the Senate was a continuing body for all purposes, since it dealt only with the problems of continuing investigations; actually, even the finding of the Senate's continuity in this respect is open to question, since a truly continuing body would not require a new motion to continue the work of the committee. In a word, the Court disproved its own dictum.

The relevant difference between the House and the Senate, which causes the latter to be described sometimes as a continuous body, is the fact that two-thirds of the Senators carry over from Congress to Congress. But the fact that two-thirds of the Senators carry over to the new Congress is not relevant to the question whether the rules of the Senate of one Congress bind the Senate of the next Congress. What is relevant is the fact that one-third of the Senators do not carry over and that, in the course of a very few years, a majority of the Senators do not carry over; and in the course of a little more than a generation, no Senator carries over.

The argument for the carryover of the rules seems to come down to this: Because two-thirds of the Senators carry over, the Senate is a continuous body; because the Senate is a continuous body, the rules carry over. Striking the words "continuous body" out of this formula, the argument comes down to this: Since two-thirds of the Senators carry over, the rules carry over. But this is a patent non sequitur. It assumes that the carryover of two-thirds of the Senate always carries over a majority in favor of the rules. The infusion of one-third newly elected Senators may very well change the majority view on rules and it is this majority view that is determinative under our constitutional democracy, not who carries over. That the new one-third may change the majority on any matter is well illustrated by the shifting of the Senate from party to party over the years. The argument that the two-thirds carryover prevents the new majority from acting on the rules disenfranchises not only the newly elected one-third, but the new majority who are prevented from exercising their powers and duties to make the rules for their own work and laws for the people.

Furthermore, the initial two-thirds which carry over to the next succeeding Congress will be dissipated in later Congresses until the initial two-thirds is less than a majority and finally is gone entirely. The chain does not last forever. To say that the Senate of the 86th Congress in 1959 is the same as the Senate of the 1st Congress in 1789 because two-thirds of its Members carried over to the Senate of the 2d Congress is to prefer romantic form to rational substance and dubious academic theory to practical reality.

Some Senators genuinely believe the Senate is a continuous body. Others genuinely believe that it is not, that it acts as a discontinuous body. Both have the right to their opinions. But when a descriptive term resulting from nothing more than the carryover of two-thirds of the Senators is used as a reason for preventing the majority of the body from determining the Senate's actions, an adjective is being confused with a reason and an effect with a cause.[14] The parliamentary deadfall dug by the Senate of a dead Congress, harmless enough as an abstraction, should not be permitted to stultify and destroy the power of the Senate and of the entire Congress in the present.

[14] Senator O'MAHONEY summed up the argument well on December 2, 1956: "I think that the present rule which makes it impossible to apply cloture to a debate upon a rule is just absurd. The Wherry amendment, which requires a two-thirds vote of all the Members of the Senate was passed long before any Member of the Senate had the opportunity last to go before the people. Senator HAYDEN, now the dean of the Senate, was elected in 1956 and the Wherry amendment was adopted, as I recall, in 1949. So there is not a sitting Member of the Senate who has not been before the people for election since the rule was passed, and I don't believe the Senate is bound by the rule—it's not the law of the Medes and the Persians—it can be changed."

V. The practice of the House of Representatives in readopting its rules in each new Congress is a relevant precedent for the Senate

As we have noted many times in this brief, article I, section 5, of the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Article I, section 1, provides that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." The Constitution contains reference after reference to the Congress of which the Senate is a coordinate part. Where any differences in the conduct or authority of the two Houses are intended, they are set forth in express terms in the Constitution and no difference is expressed in relation to the determination of rules. We believe, therefore, that the Senate can properly consider the history and practice of the House of Representatives in the adoption of its rules.

A. Brief History of House Practice on Adoption of the Rules

The House in the First Congress, as one of its first acts, adopted rules of procedure, based on those used in the Continental Congress (Galloway, Congress at the Crossroads (1946), p. 13; Annals of Congress 121). The House of the Second Congress instituted the system, now in use, of adopting the rules of the prior House at the beginning of the session (3 Annals of Congress 143). This practice apparently continued until 1860. However, for the 30-year period from 1860 to 1890, the House operated under a system of acquiescence in past rules, without necessarily formally adopting new rules at the beginning of each Congress. During this period the House operated under a resolution providing that the 1860 rules of the House should be the rules "of the present and subsequent Congresses unless otherwise ordered." This rule remained in existence until 1890 and operated as the source of authority for the rules of the House.

In 1890, there occurred perhaps the most famous example of a change in basic legislative procedure in our country. Speaker Reed ruled that at the beginning of each new Congress the House operates under general parliamentary law until new rules are adopted. By so ruling, he made it possible for the majority of the House to adopt new rules which were designed to promote effective majority exercise of legislative functions and to prevent minority obstructionism (21 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 1347; 99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 188, 189). Since 1890, House rules have been adopted anew by each incoming Congress. The 1890 episode demonstrates that acquiescence in the carryover of rules does not prevent the majority from acting when they no longer deem such acquiescence in the public interest.

B. Current House Practice on Adoption of the Rules

Very early in the first session of each new Congress, on the first or second day, the ranking member of the (old) Committee on Rules offers a resolution adopting rules for the new Congress (Galloway, "Legislative Procedure in Congress" (1955), p. 15). The resolution often is phrased in terms of reference to the rules of the preceding Congress, although the rules are sometimes set out in full (see 99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 15–24). Unless a major change is proposed, debate is nonexistent or perfunctory and the rules are adopted within a few minutes (see adoption of rules for 84th and 85th Congresses at 101 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11; 103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 47). Even when a controversial change has been proposed, the debate does not run on unduly. (See adoption of new rules for the 81st and 82d Congresses at 95 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10; 97 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9.)[15] During the period preliminary to the adoption of the rules, the House operates under general parliamentary procedure (21 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 740–749; 99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 24) and under general parliamentary procedure debate on the rules can always be effectively closed by a call for the previous question (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 24). The experience of the House within the last 50 years in adopting rules has proved conclusively that the necessity for periodic adoption every 2 years at the opening of each new Congress does not delay either the organization of the legislative body or the prompt consideration of legislative business.

C. Carryover of House Clerk

Perhaps the most striking example of a House procedure which, at first glance, is inconsistent with the House's view of itself as a discontinuous body is the carryover of the Clerk of the old House for the purpose of opening the new session of Congress in the new House. This procedure is described at 100 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 188 (see also Cannon's Procedure in House of Representatives sec. 175). It is now authorized by statute, although, of course, that statute, like the provisions of the Legislative Reorganization Act, is subject to change by the House in the exercise of its constitutional right to make its own rules. That statute, moreover, merely codifies a long-standing custom and House rule, under which the House operated prior to the statute. The carryover procedure is not limited solely to the Clerk, for, in case the Clerk is absent, the duty falls upon the Sergeant at Arms and next on the Doorkeeper (Hinds, Precedents, sec. 15). This well-known and unquestioned procedure offers a further convincing demonstration that necessary procedural, carryovers, acquiesced in over a long period of time, do not change the nature of a legislative body and cannot obliterate nor diminish the constitutional and moral right of a majority of an American legislative body to make its own rules.

The House also carries over certain other functions. These are listed in sections 6748–6754 of Hinds, Precedents. Hinds, in summarizing these carryover procedures, points out that, although the House becomes "functus officio" at the end of its term, in practice certain rules extend into the new Congress. But the carryover of the Clerk and of other items by acquiescence does not deprive the House of its right to make new rules at the opening of a new Congress no more does past acquiescence of the Senate in rules carryover deprive it of the right to make new rules at the opening of a new Congress when a majority of the Senators then elected and present so decide.

These practices and procedures of the House of Representatives are relevant to the debate concerning the adoption of new rules by the Senate. Because the House and the Senate operate as a team in a 2-year Congress, the Senate in each Congress starts anew with respect to legislative business. So does the House. (The Senate also starts anew in each new Congress the business relating to its special functions in connection with nominations and treatymaking.) Both organize their activities on a 2-year basis.

The sole significant difference between the two legislative bodies in our Congress is the duration of the individual Senators' terms and the rotation of one-third of the number of Senators every 2 years. The historical materials demonstrate that the longer term for [15] In 1951 the proposed rules were amended and then adopted without undue interruption of House business even though efforts to close debate by use of the previous question motion were unsuccessful.

Senators was established in order to provide a moderating force in Congress, a body which would have stability and the opportunity via its longer term to acquire specialized knowledge in the field of foreign affairs and some independence from the pressures of politics. (See Prescott, Drafting the Federal Constitution, pp. 247–260.) It is equally clear from the debates in the Constitutional Convention that there was a firm desire to avoid the establishment of a permanent upper house similar to the House of Lords. Thus the Convention dismissed without even a vote a suggestion made that tenure might be for life. It rejected the proposal of a 9-year term in favor of the shorter 6-year term. The fact that the Founding Fathers desired to give a measure of stability to one branch of the Congress cannot support any artificial theories abrogating the right of new Senators in each new Congress to have an equal voice in establishing the rules of its proceedings. If the rules cannot as a matter of actual fact be changed at the will of the majority, as in the House, the Senate will have been converted into that permanent, undemocratic, and irresponsive body which it was the particular intention of the drafters of the Constitution to prevent.

VI. Majority rule is the basic principle of legislative action prescribed by the Constitution of the United States: the ruling of the Vice President should be made in the light of the fact that his decision may well determine whether constitutional majority rule is to be regained in the Senate of the United States

Majority rule has not existed in the Senate of the United States for many years. The filibuster and the threat of filibuster have prevented the majority from carrying out its will in the Senate and thus in the Congress. This is in direct opposition to the letter and spirit of the Constitution which established majority rule as the basic principle of our Government, and the basis of the enacting power of the Houses of Congress. The Supreme Court has aptly described the principle of majority rule as one "sanctioned by our governmental practices, by business procedure, and by the whole philosophy of democratic institutions" N.L.R.B. v. A. J. Tower Co. (329 U.S. 324, 331).

The pervasive need for majority rule was recognized at the Constitutional Convention. Alexander Hamilton, writing in "The Federalist," No. XXII, strongly emphasized this need as follows:

"To give a minority a negative upon a majority (which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision) is, in its tendency, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser. * * * If a pertinacious minority can control the opinion of a majority, respecting the best mode of conducting it, the majority, in order that something may be done, must conform to the views of the minority; and thus the sense of the smaller number will overrule that of the greater, and give a tone to national proceedings."

The authors of the Constitution prescribed majority rule as the rule for congressional action by expressly enumerating all the instances in which more than a majority vote was to be required. These special cases were limited to five. There are two-thirds requirements in connection with: (1) The power of Congress to override the veto; (2) senatorial ratification of treaties; (3) the initiation by Congress of proposals to amend the Constitution; (4) the impeachment power; and (5) the expulsion of Members of Congress. In these rare instances, where it was felt necessary to make exceptions to majority rule, the Constitution expressly said so (art. I, sec. 7; art. II, sec. 2; art. V; art. I, sec. 3; art. I, sec 5).

This detailed specification of the two-thirds requirement in connection with particular powers demonstrates that, when Congress was to operate other than by majority rule, it was so instructed by definite language in the Constitution. When a document, as carefully drafted and considered as was the Constitution, enumerates particular exceptions to a general rule, it must be concluded that no other exceptions were intended to be made. As the Supreme Court said in Addison v. Holly Hill Co. (322 U.S. 607 at 617): "Exemptions made in such detail preclude their enlargement by implication."

The framers of the Constitution gave further evidence of their intent that the majority rule should govern in all except the five specified instances by the great care with which they limited the two-thirds requirement. At least two separate instances are recorded in which the Convention rejected efforts to impose a two-thirds requirement on legislation:

(1) On August 29, a motion to limit the national power over interstate and foreign commerce by a two-thirds provision was made and rejected. Mr. Sherman, in arguing against the motion, stated that "to require more than a majority to decide a question was always embarrassing, as had been experienced in cases requiring the votes of nine States in Congress" (referring to the Congress under the Articles of Confederation).

(2) On September 15, another attempt to fetter Congress' control over navigation by a two-thirds limitation was unsuccessful (Farrand, Records of the Federal Convention of 1787).

In addition to the rejected attempts that were made to limit the majority principle in connection with substantive powers, the motion in the Constitutional Convention to raise the quorum provision (art. I, sec. 5) from a majority to two-thirds was overwhelmingly put down. Some members of the Convention even feared that a majority was too large a number. George Morris pointed out that "the secession of a small number" might "in the national councils * * * be fatal," and this fear of his was concurred in by a number of others who spoke on the subject (Prescott, Drafting the Federal Constitution, p. 425 et seq.). Accordingly, the Congress was given power to compel the attendance of absent Members so that a majority could be gathered together and the business of the Congress dispatched.

Majority rule is the constitutional measure for legislative action. As Senator Thomas of Colorado pointed out in debating the cloture rule of 1917, "majority rule is an essential principle in American Government" (55 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 33). Yet this fundamental constitutional principle can only be reestablished in the U.S. Senate through the route of a motion to take up rules at the opening of the Senate of a new Congress. If this route is blocked by a ruling of the Vice President or otherwise, there will be no way to carry out this basic principle of the Constitution and to implement the Supreme Court's statement that a House of Congress "may not by its rules ignore constitution restraints" United States v. Ballin (144 U.S. 1, 5).

VII. Prior to the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress, the Senate will be governed by general parliamentary practice

Much has been made of the fact that the Senate would, for a period of time necessarily be governed by general parliamentary practice, if the rules were found to expire with the termination of each Congress. During the 1957 debate on the motion to adopt rules Senator Knowland, after reading off a list of existing rules of order, drew pictures of a "jungle," in which the Senate is in the position of having "to take 2 weeks, or a month, to decide what temporary rules we can use." This description credits today's Senate of the United States with less ability to organize and determine its future procedures than existed in the first Senate, and exists in the House of Representatives and every other representative body and democratic organization in the world.

As has been indicated previously in this brief, the situation in the House of Representatives is just the opposite of that pictured by Senator KNOWLAND. The House, in an orderly fashion, often in a matter of minutes, organizes itself, adopts rules, and then proceeds thereunder. When there is a dispute as to the rules to be adopted, as there was in 1953, the question is settled, not by Robert's Rules of Order or any other specific code, but by "general parliamentary law." (See 99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 24). Numerous precedents in the House have indicated that "general parliamentary usage" governs proceedings prior to the adoption of rules and that is is founded upon Jefferson's Manual and the practice of American legislative assemblies, especially of the Senate and the House of Representatives. (See Cannon's Precedents, Nos. 3383–3386; Hind's Precedents, Nos. 6758–6763). Though they do not carry over, the carefully worked out rules of the Senate in previous Congresses are one of the foremost precedents of parliamentary practice and may be given great weight, insofar as they do not interfere with the right of a majority of the Senate to adopt new rules.

The record of the Senate of the First Congress indicates equally well that procedure under general parliamentary principles is in order until specific rules are adopted for the conduct of the body. The Senate met, communicated with absent Members in order to secure a quorum, joined the House for a count of electoral votes, appointed committees to prepare a judiciary bill, joint rules and separate Senate rules, and generally carried on its business under general parliamentary practice from the time a quorum appeared on April 6, 1789, until the adoption of the first rules of the Senate on April 16, 1789. (See "Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States," vol. I, pp. 15–21.)

In similar fashion, representative bodies, membership associations and other groups meet for the first time all over the world without being immediately paralyzed for lack of rules, as some would have us think. The adoption of rules is usually among the first orders of business, but until that is accomplished, general parliamentary principles prevail.

The Senate, even in the absence of specified rules of procedure, is not without clear guidance in proceeding prior to the adoption of rules. Such guidance comes from the commands of the Constitution itself, from statutes, and from the precedents of Jefferson's Manual, prior Senate rules, the Rules of the House of Representatives and practice in other parliamentary bodies. The Constitution is quite explicit with respect to certain basic procedure. It provides a presiding officer in the person of the Vice President (art. I, sec. 3, clause 4), for the election of a President pro tempore (art. I, sec. 3, clause 5), a time for meeting (art. I, sec. 4, clause 2), the size of the quorum and the manner of compelling attendance (art. I, sec. 5, clause 1); the method of expelling a Member (art. I, sec. 5, clause 2); the manner of voting and the number required for recording the yeas and nays (art. I, sec. 5, clause 3); the manner of passing bills (art. I, sec. 7, clause 2); and the required oath (art. VI, clause 3). Thus a constitutional framework always exists for convening and organizing the Senate. In addition, legislative enactments have spelled out some of these provisions further, as with respect to the administration of the oath (act of June 1, 1789; act of April 18, 1876; 2 U.S.C. secs. 21–24). Within this framework, the example of the House of Representatives points out that there is a body of general parliamentary law which includes the rules of a preceding Congress. However, the previous rules are not precedent, where they would conflict with the orderly process of adopting new rules. The Vice President pointed this out in his 1957 opinion when he concluded:

"The Senate should not be bound by any provision in those previous rules which denies the membership of the Senate the power to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules."

Whenever doubt exists as to the applicable rule under general practice, the Chair would make a ruling, as has always been the case in matters not covered by the rules, and such ruling would, of course, be subject to appeal to the Senate and decision by majority vote.

For example, conflict of the type described by the Vice President clearly exists with respect to the provisions of rule XXII, and other methods of ending debate and bringing an issue to a vote. Under general parliamentary usage the motion for the previous question is applicable in such a case. This is so under Jefferson's Manual, which is used both in the Senate and House of Representatives in the absence of specific rules (see 53 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 3732)[10] and is printed as part of both manuals. It is also the case under the procedure in the House of Representatives both before and after adoption of rules, and generally in other manuals of parliamentary procedure. The Speaker of the House has on a number of occasions ruled that "the motion for the previous question is in order under general parliamentary law." (Cannon's Precedents, vol. 8, sec. 3386, and other sections previously cited.)

The motion is now generally made in the form "I move the previous question" or "I move that the question be now put," and if successful cuts off debate and requires an immediate vote on the main question. (See Rules of the House of Representatives; Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice; Mason's Manual of Legislative Practice; Rules of the Confederate Congress; rules of the upper house of 36 State legislatures and the lower house of 47; Rules of the House of Commons. See also 103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6669–6680; S. Rept. 1509, 85th Congress, p. 19, et seq.). It generally requires a majority vote of those present and voting.

If, at some stage of the debate on adopting rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress, a filibuster should ensue whose purpose is to deny the membership of the Senate the power to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules, a motion may be made for the previous question. Consideration has also been given to the alternative of raising a point of order against such a filibuster as being an interference with the Senate's constitutional right to make its own rules. We have, however, deemed it more appropriate to use the motion for the previous question if such a filibuster takes place, as it would let the Senate itself, in the first instance, determine whether or not debate is to end.

VIII. Conclusion

Article I, section 5 of the Constitution gives the Senate of each succeeding Congress, just as it gives the House of each succeeding Congress, the power to make its own rules and this power exists without regard to anything that the Senate of an earlier Congress may have done (point I).

We have seen how the fundamental principles of democratic government require that the majority of the Senators of each new Congress have the right to act unfettered by an earlier majority (point I). We have seen how the Senate has refused to be bound by the action of the Senate of earlier Congresses whenever its own majority desired to take action (point II). We have seen how the Senate wipes the slate clean at the opening of each new Congress (point III). We have seen how the Senate has talked continuity and acted discontinuously (point IV). We have seen that the history and practice of the House of Representatives is a relevant precedent in favor of a ruling that the motion to take up rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress is in order (point V). We have seen that this is the only method to restore the constitutional principle of majority rule to the Senate of the United States (point VI), and we have seen that prior to the adoption of rules the Senate would be governed by and effectively operated under general parliamentary practice (point VII).

For all these reasons we urge the Vice President, acting as President of the Senate, to hold the motion to take up rules in order and thus to make possible a return to the constitutional principle of majority rule.

Respectfully submitted by Senators joining in motion to take up rules.

[From the AFL–CIO News]

AFL–CIO President George Meany today said the 13½ million member federation supports attempts by liberals in both Houses of Congress to "make the deliberations of the Congress more democratic."

In a signed editorial in the current issue of the American Federationist, official monthly magazine of the AFL–CIO published today, Meany urged the Members of the Senate to liberalize rule XXII and the Members of the House to curb the powers of the Rules Committee.

These votes, he said, "will be as important as any vote the Members of Congress are called upon to cast in the next 2 years."

"We urge the Members of both bodies," he wrote, "to vote for a return to the basic concept of a democratic republic—majority rule."

The text of Meany's editorial, entitled "Democracy in the Congress," follows:

Before the 86th Congress is even hours old, the American people will have an opportunity to measure the level of democracy in both Houses.

In the Senate, the test will come over the much-publicized rule XXII, which now thwarts the will of the majority.

In the House, where there has been less public notice of the fight, it will center on an attempt to make the all-powerful House Rules Committee less dictatorial.

The AFL–CIO, which firmly believes in majority determination, supports both attempts to make the deliberations of the Congress more democratic.

The Senate battle has been labeled as a civil rights fight. It is that, of course, but it is much more. Civil rights legislation has been throttled from time to time by the use of the filibuster which is made possible by the continued existence of rule XXII.

But there is more than civil rights at stake, as important as is the need for meaningful and inclusive legislation to wipe discrimination and segregation from the American scene.

All sorts of social and economic welfare legislation has been hampered, compromised down, and even defeated because of the threat of a filibuster.

Certainly the rights of the minority must be protected. Certainly the need for full and free debate in the Senate must be preserved.

But it is a travesty to pretend that by denying equal justice to America's minority groups through the use of rule XXII that that we are actually defending minority rights.

It is equally unjust to distort freedom of debate into a license for the destruction of legislation vital to the implementation of America's proud promise of equality for all her people.

It would be a mistake, however, to become so engrossed in the rule XXII fight in the Senate as to ignore the equally important struggle in the House to curb the legislative life-and-death power now exercised by the Rules Committee.

No believer in the democratic process can countenance a legislative structure which permits a tiny group in the House of Representatives to throttle the legislative will of the majority. Certainly the committee should be so constituted as to be representative of the entire House.

In the past, when the House contained as many liberal and progressive Members as does the 86th Congress, the committee's powers were limited. For example, a 21-day rule, was in existence—a rule that recognized the need for some sort of House "traffic control" system but equally recognized that the House "traffic cops" could not be the undisputed bosses of this representative body. Under the 21-day rule, of course, the majority's will could only be delayed, not denied.

In the House, even more than in the Senate, it is not only civil rights but economic and social welfare measures that are endangered by the present procedure. The legislative history is clear on this point. The House has demonstrated by its actions a far greater sense of moral responsibility in the civil rights picture than has been displayed in the Senate.

We in the AFL–CIO believe the Members of Congress face a major test on these issues—a test which will be resolved in the very early hours of the first session.

The vote on rule XXII in the Senate and the vote on curbing the powers of the Rules Committee in the House will be as important as any vote the Members of Congress are called upon to cast in the next 2 years.

We urge the Members of both bodies to vote for a return to the basic concept of a democratic republic—majority rule.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Illinois has advanced in his discussion both the case in behalf of the Anderson motion, and, as he indicated to the Senator from Louisiana, the argument in support of the substantive provisions which, in due time, we shall offer as a basic change in rule XXII.

I wonder if the Senator from Illinois would not agree with me that at this stage of our deliberations and discussion those of us who support the proposal of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], are doing so, first, on the basis that it is a constitutional privilege which was extended to the Houses of Congress to determine their respective rules. That is the first proposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is perfectly clear from article I, section 5, of the Constitution, which provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

[10] On Mar. 8, 1916, while the Senate was considering legislation, a Member interrupted the Speaker with a point of order and in presenting his objection inquired of the Chair if Jefferson's Manual was to be considered as an authority in the procedure and practice of the Senate. The President pro tempore, Senator Clarke of Arkansas, replied: "It has a certain degree of influence, but it is not a direct authority."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Secondly, the Senator from Illinois, as I understand, is stating that procedure in the Senate or in any other parliamentary body is of such significance and importance, so far as concerns its ultimate relationship to the conduct of that body and the substance of legislation which emanates from the body, that each Member of the body should be entitled to a voice in the decision on the rules which become the guiding principles of legislative conduct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I quite agree.

Mr. HUMPHREY. As I understand the Senator's proposal, he has argued that, while only a maximum of one-third of the Senate may change in any 2-year period, it is presumptuous to presume that the other two-thirds of the Senate will not in any way have changed their minds relative to the rules of the Senate. So the doctrine of a continuing body does not pertain to the concept of rules. It pertains to other concepts or relationships of the Senate, but not to the subject of rules.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true. Earlier in the afternoon the Senator from Illinois referred to the fact that of the 98 present Members of the Senate, 60 were not present in 1949, when the existing rule XXII was adopted. Ten either voted against the rule which was then adopted, or registered themselves in opposition, and only 28 of the present 98 Members of the Senate voted or were announced in favor of rule XXII—when it was adopted in 1949. We hope that a considerable number of them have seen the error of their way, and would now be willing to vote for a change.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. So that we may have this matter in the simple and direct language and tie down the principal points and the argument being made by the proponents of the Anderson motion, there are those who have attempted to confuse the American people and even Members of the Senate. I do not say that the attempt has been made with premeditation, but, rather, because of misunderstanding. The attempt has been made to confuse people on the subject of the Senate being a continuing body, when in fact, as has been pointed out repeatedly in the debate, that phrase, which has been applied to the Senate, applies to the two-thirds membership of the Senate, not to its legislative responsibility.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That contention, as W. S. Gilbert has mentioned in the Mikado, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, tra la, has nothing to do with the case. The question is whether the existing Senate shall be bound by rules, adopted long ago, which operate in many cases to prevent a vote on a proposal which the majority of the Senate wishes to adopt.

Mr. HUMPHREY. So that we may finally settle this point, every Member of the Senate knows, and every reporter in the press gallery knows, and every citizen of the United States knows, and everyone else knows that at the end of every Congress bills which have cleared committees and remain on the Senate calendar but have not been acted upon by the Senate are dead, that they lose their hold on life. The calendar of the Senate, which is the official record of the Senate, is nonexistent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is wiped clean.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; wiped clean. The calendar of the Senate of the 85th Congress is consumed in flame, and all that is left is the ashes. The calendar represents the legislative responsibilities and actions of the duly authorized committees of Congress.

Likewise, treaties must be submitted anew, even though they may have cleared the Committee on Foreign Relations, where there is a special responsibility of the Senate of the United States in the treatymaking function. Treaties, likewise, lose their life at the end of a particular Congress. Resolutions and joint resolutions and all other attributes of the legislative process die at the end of a session. Therefore, it is fair to say, is it not, that, with the exception of where the Constitution prescribes unusual duties for either the House or the Senate, the rules of the Senate and of the House pertain to majority rule. Secondly, in the instance of the Senate, the two-thirds provision, as the Senator from Illinois has pointed out, deals only with certain instances.

Finally, under the constitutional requirements of the Senate, we have the opportunity and privilege of writing the rules by which we will be governed.

I am pleased to associate myself with the Senator's remark and to join him in this matter, because I believe it to be sound legislative practice and one that is long overdue.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. A minute or two ago the distinguished Senator from Illinois had occasion to comment on the continuing body theory in terms of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Mikado." I should like to recall to my good friend some lines from the "Mikado" which immediately follow the lines he has quoted and which I believe are equally pertinent to the continuing body theory. As I recall those lines from my youth, they run something like this:

I've got to take under my wing,
Tra la,
A most unattractive old thing,
Tra la.

Mr. DOUGLAS. "With a caricature of a face."

Mr. CLARK. With a caricature of a face.

I suggest that those lines are equally applicable to that theory.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Now that we are speaking in a lighter vein, I should like to refer to Tennyson's "Brook." The theory upon which the advocates of the continuing body rely reminds me of these lines from Tennyson's "Brook":

Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever.

That, I believe, is the contention of those who say the rules of the Senate adopted in 1789 and 1949 are now continuing. They are not. The Anderson motion will help to clear the path for action. If it is tabled, the friends of the filibuster will have gained an initial victory.

(The following are the matters ordered to be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the address by Senator DOUGLAS:)

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will yield with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois may yield to me, so that I may make a brief statement, with the understanding that the Senator from Illinois does not lose the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask the Senator: Does he intend to make a reply to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; I simply desire to make a brief statement for the information of Senators.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, certainly; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] desires to make a statement in connection with the Anderson motion. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] expects to speak on that motion this evening, and to conclude his statement this evening. I expect to have the Senate remain in session until the Senator from Oregon shall have had an opportunity to conclude his statement.

The Senate will go to the Chamber of the other body tomorrow at 12:10 p.m. I should like to ask unanimous consent that I be recognized at 11:30 o'clock tomorrow morning—the Senate will convene at 10 o'clock—for the purpose of making my motion to lay the Anderson motion on the table. At that time we can have a quorum call and a yea-and-nay vote. Then we can proceed to the Chamber of the other body.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be recognized at 11:30 tomorrow morning for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum and then having the Senate vote on a motion to table, which I shall make at that time. There will be no votes this evening.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Will there be a morning hour tomorrow?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; it is not customary to have a morning hour until after the President has addressed Congress.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will there be an opportunity for Senators who oppose the motion to speak against it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There will be an hour and a half in the morning in which to speak, and there will be some time this evening, perhaps, if the Senator from Oregon concludes his speech early. At any rate, there will be an hour and a half tomorrow morning.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from Texas.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Some of my colleagues on this side of the aisle did not understand the Senator's statement. Am I correct in stating that it is the intention of the majority leader to ask now for unanimous consent that he be recognized at 11:30 o'clock tomorrow morning?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes. So that all Senators may be informed, that will be the time when the motion to table will be made.

It is my purpose to have the Senate remain in session for such time this evening as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] may desire to speak.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator from Texas be so kind as to arrange, if he can, that the hour and a half tomorrow morning will be equally divided, so that Senators on both sides of the question may be heard? Otherwise, one Senator could take the entire hour and a half.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will attempt to arrange that Senators who desire to speak in the morning may have reasonable time in which to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MORSE. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—in deference to the majority leader and other Senators, I think this statement ought to be made for the RECORD: The majority leader certainly reserves the right under the unanimous-consent request that if he discovers tomorrow that he wants to postpone, because some other Senator raises the same type of objection I have raised to an early meeting and vote on this matter, to make his motion at his own discretion, and at such time as he cares to do so.

I think that that parliamentary prerogative ought to be guaranteed to the majority leader, and that he not be placed in such a position here tonight that he is bound to make his motion to lay on the table at 11:30 tomorrow morning. The majority leader has notified the Senate that that is his intention and his time schedule. He should certainly be in the position of making his motion to lay on the table whenever his discretion so dictates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand that I would be in that position and that I would not be foreclosed in such a situation.

Earlier today I assured several Senators, after canvassing the situation as best I could and after hearing the proponents and opponents, and looking over the history of the debates on the identical motion before—we used 3 hours and 50 minutes the last time, and 4 hours one time before—that there would not be lengthy discussion. But many Senators were not present at that time. Some of those Senators have not had the opportunity to speak. Nevertheless, we estimated that we would vote today at some time between 4 and 6 o'clock. However, it will inconvenience some Senators to return later in the evening, and there is no necessity for them to do so.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has assured me that he desires to speak shortly and will speak at some length. I certainly have no desire to attempt to foreclose his speaking. I think his speech will be of benefit to the Senate and to the country. I think we will want to have the benefit of his views.

Therefore, I have made the request that I be recognized at this time, to point out to the Senate that I feel that every Senator who wants to speak will have the chance to speak.

Tomorrow I expect to make a motion to table the Anderson motion. However, if a situation develops which makes it compelling or desirable that that motion be withheld, I shall withhold it.

I did not want Senators who were here this evening and expecting to vote between 4 and 6 o'clock to remain with that understanding. Several Senators wired to their States that they could not attend important meetings because this was the best estimate we could make. Now the best estimate we can make is that there will be Senators who will speak this evening. There will be an hour and a half tomorrow morning, and I will try to divide that time equally between the proponents and opponents of the motion.

Then I plan at 11:30 to make a motion to table, and I ask unanimous consent that at that time I be recognized for that purpose, if I desire to do so.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, let me say that in order to avoid as much misunderstanding as possible of my position, although I know it will always be misunderstood by some, I want the RECORD to show that I have been waiting since yesterday to discuss this issue. I happen to believe that my conversation with new Members of the Senate shows unquestionably that in their minds the issue is a very complex one, and that many of them are confronted with it for the first time.

At the meetings of the liberal groups that have been caucusing about this matter, I have said that I do not think this matter can be segmentized. I believe that before the voting begins, it is necessary for us to consider all phases and facets of this general problem. That is why I wish to place in the RECORD, for the benefit of anyone who may be interested, if anyone is, the point of view I have held for 14 years in the Senate, because during the first year I was a Member of the Senate I began this effort in regard to proposals to change the cloture rule of the Senate, in order to try to establish a rule which would make possible the exercise of majority rights in the Senate.

The majority leader has said very truthfully to me that he was of the impression, from the discussions held this morning at the desk, and I was not a party to them, that the understanding in regard to finishing the debate today put him in a position in which he could proceed, later today, to move to lay on the table. But I was not a party to that discussion, and neither were certain other Senators.

Of course I assure the majority leader that he has a parliamentary right to make that motion whenever he wishes. But I wish to state that if he did so before I had finished my remarks, that would amount to the application of cloture against me.

The Senator from Texas has been very gracious in pointing out to me that he understands my point of view—even though, of course, that does not mean that he agrees with it—and that he has no intention of preventing me from making my speech tonight. With that explanation in the RECORD, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHURCH in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—although I hope I shall not have to object—let me say that some Members of the Senate have under consideration an amendment to the motion of the Senator from New Mexico; and we wish to have an opportunity to think about that amendment this evening, and perhaps to submit it tomorrow when the Senate convenes. The precise language of the amendment has not yet been agreed upon; but, in general, the effort would be to narrow the rules in a manner—which would not be determined immediately—so there could be no question, as some Senators have suggested, that we would be offering a Pandora's box.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If it is parliamentary, it can be offered; Senators will have 1½ hours for that, tomorrow.

Mr. CLARK. Then I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears no objection; and the request is agreed to unanimously.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Can the Senator from Texas assure the Senate that no votes will be taken this evening?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I cannot give such assurance; but I can assure the Senate that so far as I am concerned, I have no intention to have a vote taken this evening. I know of no vote to be taken this evening, and I will try to avoid the taking of a vote this evening. But any Senator could suggest the absence of a quorum, and the Senate could become involved in matters. However, I do not anticipate any vote this evening.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. If the Senator from Montana wants that assurance, I will give it to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank both the majority leader and the distinguished Senator from Oregon, and I hope they will be found to be good prophets.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the colloquy which has occurred be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES ON FRIDAY, TO RECEIVE COMMUNICATIONS FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if my colleague will indulge me a moment further, I shall be very grateful to him. I ask him to yield with the same understanding.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very well; I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I send to the desk House Concurrent Resolution 1, and request its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (H. Con. Res. 1) was read, and considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, January 9, 1959, at 12:30 o'clock postmeridian, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—AMENDMENT

Mr. MORTON submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him, to the resolution (S. Res. 5) amending rules XXII and XXXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I cannot help but feel that the Senate itself, as an institution, is at this moment under attack and in peril of destruction. As is so often the case, the most imminent danger to this, as to many other institutions, lies from within rather than from without. Surely the proponents of the pending motion do not envisage the depth and breadth of their proposal.

Tradition, in and of itself, is no complete answer to any problem. Nevertheless, longstanding traditions are seldom maintained without sufficient reason. Almost invariably, traditions serve as a warning beacon of obscure, but sound and logical, purposes. A beacon of more than 170 years unbroken tradition stands as a warning of the seriousness of the proposal before this body. Should the motion to proceed to a consideration of the rules be favorably considered by this body, this 170-year tradition will be destroyed, and regardless of a subsequent return to the same method of procedure by this body after sober reflection, the tradition will be broken, and the beacon extinguished forever.

Even more vital, however, are the logical purposes which prompted the unshattered existence of this tradition. Foremost among these purposes is that of insuring an orderly procedure, so vital in such an authoritative body.

Complaints have been made that this body is not only deliberative, but on occasions, dilatory, when operating under its present rules. Yet some of those who voice these complaints would have this body declare itself, by an affirmative vote to proceed to the adoption of rules, to be a noncontinuing body and, therefore, without any rules whatsoever. It has been suggested that during the interim between this vote and the adoption of new rules by a majority vote of this body, that the Senate proceed under general parliamentary law or, as one self-styled authority suggested, under "Robert's Rules of Order." I cannot conceive of a more perfect example of jumping from the frying pan into the fire than to proceed from a disagreement as to what the rules should be, to a disagreement on what the rules are, as would be the case if this body attempted to operate under general parliamentary law, or even "Robert's Rules of Order."

The Senate is not an ordinary parliamentary body. Analogies to the procedure of other parliamentary bodies have little, if any, relevancy to the question before us. For instance, the House of Representatives is exclusively a legislative body. The Senate is far more. In addition to being a legislative body, it performs, by constitutional mandate, both executive and judicial functions. Article II, section 2 of the Constitution provides that the President shall share with the Senate his executive treaty-making power and his power of appointment of the officers of the United States. Article I, section 3 of the Constitution requires of the Senate a judicial function by reposing in the Senate the sole power to try all impeachments.

The uniqueness of the Senate is not confined, by any means, to its variety of functions. There are innumerable other aspects about this body which prevent its orderly operation at any time under parliamentary law other than its own rules, adopted in accordance with the provisions of those rules. For example, almost all parliamentary procedures presuppose that any main question, after due notice, can be decided by at least a majority of the members of the particular body using the parliamentary procedure. Any Senate rules which presupposed such a conclusion would be inoperable, for the Constitution itself specifies the necessity for two-thirds majority for action on many matters. Among these issues requiring a two-thirds majority by constitutional mandate are for conviction on impeachment; to expel a Member; to overide a Presidential veto; to concur in a treaty; to call a constitutional convention; to propose a constitutional amendment to the States and to constitute a quorum when the Senate is choosing a Vice President. The very fact that each State, regardless of its population, has equal representation in this body belies the thought of simple majority rule in its deliberation.

It is this very uniqueness which has compelled so many to conclude that the Senate had a degree of continuity unknown to other parliamentary bodies.

The Founding Fathers themselves, in drafting the Constitution, provided for this continuity by establishing a 6-year term of office for each Senator, so that a minimum of two-thirds of the entire body would continue from one session to the next. Had the Founding Fathers desired continuity only, but less than a continuing body, they could have provided for a staggered term of 4 years for a Senator with one-half of the Senate returning from one session to the next. This would not have provided the necessary quorums to do business at all times, and the Senate would not have been a continuing body.

The Senate itself has reenforced the premise that it is a continuing body by the unbroken precedent of continuing its rule from one session to the next. In recent years there are two clearcut precedents upholding the Senate's status as a continuing body, and even more specifically, that its rules continue from one session to the next. In 1953 and again in 1957, this body tabled a motion that it proceed to take up the adoption of rules for the Senate.

In 1954, the Senate voted to condemn the late Senator McCarthy for his conduct in a previous session. The committee report accompanying the resolution stated:

> The fact that the Senate is a continuing body should require little discussion. This has been uniformly recognized by history, precedent, and authority.

In addition, the Senate has jealously maintained its authority to continue its committees in their operations between adjournment and the commencement of the next ensuing session. The Supreme Court in the 1926 case of McGrain against Daugherty specifically ruled that the Senate was a continuing body and that, therefore, its committees were authorized to act during the recess after the expiration of a Congress.

Is the purpose sought to be accomplished by the drastic action proposed so worthy as to justify the risk of stripping the Senate's committees of their authority to function after the date of adjournment? Is it so imperative that it justifies the abandonment of orderly procedure for the jungle of "general parliamentary law"?

The proponents of the pending motion aver that the real target for this all-out effort is one Senate rule, and only one—the one which primarily governs the limitation of debate. This much maligned rule has been made the scapegoat by many groups. Its greatest distinction, however, appears to be its seclusion from objective consideration.

In discussing the history of limitation of debate in the United States Senate, many newspapers and newspaper columnists appear to be under the impression that a limitation of debate existed in the United States in the period between 1789 and 1806. Their assumption is based on the fact that, during that period, the Senate rules allowed the use of a motion called the previous question. During the debate on this subject in previous years, the point was discussed, and it appears that the debate would have established in the mind of a reasonable person that there was no limitation on debate in the Senate during this period. Nevertheless, some newspaper editorials and columnists apparently still labor under the misapprehension that "the previous question," which existed in the Senate between 1789 and 1806, was a motion to end debate. For this reason, I believe it would be well to review this matter to some extent so that any lingering doubts that there was a limitation of debate in the Senate between the years 1789 and 1917 will be dispelled.

For all the attention they have been given, it appears that the comments on "the previous question" in "Robert's Rules of Order" have not been presented in debate on this subject previously. The passage to which I refer appears on page 117 of "Robert's Rules of Order, Revised," 75th anniversary edition, as follows:

Note on the previous question: Much of the confusion heretofore existing in regard to the previous question has arisen from the great changes which this motion has undergone. As originally designed, and at present used in the English Parliament, the previous question was not intended to suppress debate, but to suppress the main question, and therefore, in England, it is always moved by the enemies of the measure, who then vote in the negative. It was first used in 1604, and was intended to be applied only to delicate questions; it was put in this form, "shall the main question be put?" and being negatived, the main question was dismissed for that session. Its form was afterward changed to this, which is used at present, "Shall the main question be now put?" and if negatived the question was dismissed, at first only until after the ensuing debate was over, but now, for that day. The motion for the previous question could be debated; when once put to vote, whether decided affirmatively or negatively, it prevented any discussion of the main question, for, if decided affirmatively, the main question was immediately put, and if decided negatively (that is, that the main question be not now put), it was dismissed for the day.

Our Congress has gradually changed the English previous question into an entirely different motion, so that, while in England, the mover of the previous question votes against it, in this country he votes for it. At first the previous question was debatable; if adopted it cut off all motions except the main question, which was immediately put to vote; and if rejected the main question was dismissed for that day as in England. Congress, in 1805, made it undebatable. In 1840 the rule was changed so as not to cut off amendments but to bring the House to a vote first upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. In 1848 its effect was changed again so as to bring the House to a vote upon the motion to commit if it had been made, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and finally upon the main question. In 1860 Congress decided that the only effect of the previous question, if the motion to postpone were pending, should be to bring the House to a direct vote on the postponement, thus preventing the previous question from cutting off any pending motion. In 1860 the rule was modified also so as to allow it to be applied, if so specified, to an amendment or to an amendment of an amendment, without affecting anything else, and so that if the previous question were lost the debate would be resumed. In 1880 the rule was further changed so as to allow it to be applied to single motions, or to a series of motions, the motions to which it is to apply being specified in the demand; and 30 minutes' debate, equally divided between the friends and the enemies of the proposition, was allowed after the previous question had been ordered, if there had been no debate previously. In 1890 the 30 minutes' debate was changed to 40 minutes. The previous question now is simply a motion to close debate and proceed to voting on the immediately pending question and such other pending questions as it has been ordered upon.

From this discussion it should be clear that between 1789 and 1806 "the previous question" used in the Senate was not intended to suppress debate, but to suppress the main question, and, therefore, to avoid a vote on a particular piece of legislation.

In 1816, the House of Representatives debated the issue of free debate. They adopted a strict cloture by a perversion of the meaning of "the previous question."

Mr. Gaston, speaking in favor of free debate, pointed out that the original purpose of "the previous question" was to postpone one subject in order to take up another. In other words, it was simply a demand that the House should first announce whether it was then expedient to decide the question under debate or to turn temporarily to other business.

The Continental Congress had followed this procedure and had made proper use of "the previous question."

Over the years after the first Congress, there were attempts to pervert the meaning of "the previous question." That was the reason for the debate in 1816. Mr. Gaston pointed out at that time that the House, in attempting to change the historic and true meaning of "the previous question," was abandoning its true principles.

On this particular question the elder Senator Henry Cabot Lodge said in 1893:

There never has been in the Senate any rule which enabled the majority to close debate or compel a vote. "The previous question," which existed in the earliest years and was abandoned in 1806, was "the previous question" of England, and not that with which everyone is familiar today in our House of Representatives. It was not in practice a form of cloture, and it is, therefore, correct to say that the power of closing debate in the modern sense has never existed in the Senate.

Through the years the Senate has debated the pros and cons of unlimited debate, but it remains a fact that for 125 years, from 1789 to 1917, the Senate had no cloture rule at all. During that time the parade of great men to the Senate continued, and most of them were firm advocates of free debate. Since 1917, we have had a two-thirds requirement for cloture in one form or another.

In the interest of objectivity, let us compare rule XXII with rule XXIX, "The Previous Question," of the suddenly popular Reuther's proposal of Robert's Rules of Order.

Rule XXII requires a two-thirds vote of the membership to end debate on any particular measure, except the rules themselves. A parliamentary body acting under "Robert's Rules of Order" can end debate and force a vote on the pending question by passing a motion of the previous question by a two-thirds majority of those present and voting. Even under "Robert's Rules of Order," a majority vote, even with notice, cannot end debate.

The difference, in practical effect, is not overly large. For example, had the limitation of debate in the Senate always been governed by "The Previous Question" in the present "Robert's Rules of Order," no result on previous efforts to invoke cloture would have been different from the result under the rules as they have existed. Had the present rule XXII of the Senate always controled the limitation of debate, only in one instance would the result on cloture attempts have been changed. The particular instance to which I refer was a cloture vote which prevailed in 1927 under a rule requiring two-thirds of those present and voting to end debate.

The distinction between rule XXII and "The Previous Question," though slight in practical effect, is not without a strong basis in reason. "Robert's Rules of Order" was designed for the general use of societies, which, not being governmental bodies, have no authority to compel attendance of delegates "Robert's Rules" therefore recognize the impracticality of making the actions of those bodies for whom his rules were designed contingent on membership. "Robert's Rules" used the most practical basis for his purposes for protecting the rights of minorities in societies generally.

The U.S. Senate, to understate the matter, occupies a position greatly different from the general societies for which "Robert's Rules" was designed. Its membership is under oath to support the Constitution and well and faithfully to discharge the duties of their offices. Surely a presumption by the rules of regular attendance is not unduly harsh. If it be too harsh, why has there been no attack on the provision of rule V which authorizes the Sergeant at Arms to compel the attendance of absent Senators?

So far as limitation of debate is concerned, the only distinction between rule XXII of the Senate and the rules designed for Podunk's local Liar's Club is the presupposition by the Senate rules of the regular attendance of its Members. Is this distinction too great for what has been called the greatest deliberative body on earth?

Consider what the Senate is being asked to risk in an effort to erase this distinction, possibly in favor of a greater distinction in the other direction. The proponents of the pending motion would have the Senate declare itself without rules. My research having failed to find the "general parliamentary law" codified, I presume the Senate would next have to determine temporary rules under which to proceed to adopt permanent rules. As I have indicated, Mr. Reuther has recommended "Robert's Rules of Order." It is quite possible, even probable, that a majority of Senators would prefer even temporary rules other than Robert's. There are numerous others, such as "Parliamentary Procedure," by Rose Marie Crugan; "Handbook of Parliamentary Procedure," by Henry A. Davidson; "Lex Parliamentaria Americana," by Luther Stearns Cushing; "Manual of Parliamentary Practice," by Luther Stearns Cushing; "Rules of Proceeding and Debate in Deliberative Assemblies," by Luther Stearns Cushing; "Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons," by John Hatsell; "A Manual of Parliamentary Practice," by Thomas Jefferson; "Manual of Legislative Procedure," by Paul Mason. It is even conceivable that no one of these or other complete set of rules would be acceptable to a majority. Can anyone anticipate the confusion which might result from opening such a Pandora's box? The Senate could easily spend several months debating and deciding on temporary rules. After that would come the more difficult and more time consuming task of debating and agreeing on each section of each of the permanent rules. It would be slow work under the order provided by our existing rules; but in the jungle in which we are urged to jump, it would be almost impossible.

Mr. President, in the meantime, it behooves us to remember that the existence of every committee of the Senate stems from the Senate rules, and, therefore, the committees of the Senate would pass with the rules. During the succeeding indeterminable period until new permanent rules were adopted, our committees would not be working. Legislative business would be at a standstill. The emergencies of the country, both domestic and foreign, would have to run their course while we of the Senate wrangled in an attempt to extricate ourselves from the self-made jungle of "general parliamentary confusion." Heaven forbid that we place ourselves in such a position.

Nor would that be the end. Should we so abandon order for confusion, a precedent would be set for future Congresses, many of which would then want to assert their independence and draft their own rules. Each group could flex its muscles and determine its gain or loss of strength among new Members. It is conceivable to me that eventually the first year of each session would have to be set aside for the Senate to make its rules under which to act on substantive matters during the second year of the session. It may be said that this is the wildest sort of speculation—and it is. That is just the point. We are asked to sacrifice the traditionally orderly procedure of the Senate for something as to the nature of which we can only speculate; and I may add that the only guide that is offered to limit our speculation is our individual imagination.

I sincerely hope and trust that the Senate has not degenerated to the point at which it will, at one grand sweep, shatter the cornerstone of its existence. It deserves a better fate than strangulation in a parliamentary jungle of its own making.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise in support of the motion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON].

I have joined in sponsoring the resolution to proceed to the adoption of rules because I believe it is both wrong and dangerous to deny the Senate as a whole the exercise of its constitutional right to determine the rules of its proceeding—and to do this in order to perpetuate a situation in which the membership as a whole is placed at the mercy of a small minority.

That this is the situation is well known to all of us. It has been demonstrated on a number of occasions when an actual or threatened filibuster has foreclosed the Senate from consideration or action despite the wishes of Senators generally.

The Senate has frequently been described as the "greatest deliberative body in the world." But how does this square with the fact that a handful of its Members can reduce it to legislative impotence? How does it comport with the attempt now being made to deny the Senate the right to pass on the rules that govern its conduct?

Mr. President, to me the issue seems simple and clear. It is, no more or no less, whether the Members of the Senate shall be allowed to review the rules under which they must operate.

I realize that, as in the past, those opposing amendment of the Senate rules argue that, unlike the House, the Senate is a continuing body, and that therefore its rules continue, without readoption, from one Congress to the next. Whether the Senate is a continuing body is an interesting question. Plausible argument can be mustered in support of the proposition. Certainly, there can be no doubt that in the sense that two-thirds of its membership carries over from one Congress to the next, it is a continuing body. But even more convincing arguments can be made to the contrary.

In every major activity the Senate recognizes a constitutional right of the Senate of each new Congress to determine anew both legislative and executive business. All consideration of bills, resolutions, treaties, and nominations starts at the beginning of each Congress without reference to, or continuation of, what has taken place in the past; new officers and committee members are elected in the Senate of each new Congress; when the Senate finally adjourns, the slate is wiped clean; the proceedings begin again in the next Congress.

Indeed, the thing that stands out in any thorough analysis is that—apart from membership—everything starts afresh. And rules, too, start afresh the moment a majority of the Senators at the opening of the Senate of a new Congress so will it and so vote. All that has happened over the past years is that there has been acquiescence in the carryover of rules of the Senate from one Congress to the next Congress. But a carryover of the rules, based on acquiescence, is certainly no precedent for carryover in the absence of acquiescence. And we most certainly do not acquiesce.

But whatever one's views as to the Senate as a continuing body, this question is not relevant to the issue presently before us; indeed, it obscures, rather than illuminates, the real question we have to decide. For, even if it be conceded for purposes of argument that the Senate is a continuing body, this cannot affect, as I see it, the right of the Senate to establish its rules pursuant to the constitutional provision that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

The advisory ruling of the Vice President at the opening of the last Congress ably states the matter, as follows:

> The statement which the Chair now makes relates specifically to the question of what the parliamentary situation will be as the Senate votes on the matter currently being discussed. That question, and others which have been discussed in the debate today, in effect, go back to the basic question, Do the rules of the Senate continue from one Congress to another?
> Although there is a great volume of written comment and opinion to the effect that the Senate is a continuing body with continuing rules, as well as some opinion to the contrary, the Presiding Officer of the Senate has never ruled directly on this question. Since there are no binding precedents, we must first turn to the Constitution for guidance.
> The constitutional provision under which only one-third of the Senate membership is changed by election in each Congress can only be construed to indicate the intent of the framers that the Senate should be a continuing parliamentary body for at least some purposes. By practice for 167 years the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another.
> The Constitution also provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." This constitutional right is lodged in the membership of the Senate and it may be exercised by a majority of the Senate at any time. When the membership of the Senate changes, as it does upon the election of each Congress, it is the Chair's opinion that there can be no question that the majority of the new existing membership of the Senate, under the Constitution, have the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed.
> The question, therefore, is, "How can these two constitutional mandates be reconciled?"
> It is the opinion of the Chair that while the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another, the right of a current majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress to adopt its own rules, stemming as it does from the Constitution itself, cannot be restricted or limited by rules adopted by a majority of the Senate in a previous Congress.
> Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional.
> It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect.

Then, at the end of the Vice President's advisory opinion he said:

> In summary, until the Senate at the initiation of a new Congress expresses its will otherwise, the rules in effect in the previous Congress in the opinion of the Chair remain in effect, with the exception that the Senate should not be bound by any provision in those previous rules which denies the membership of the Senate to exercise its constitutional right to make its own rules.

I know of no clearer statement of the point. I think it is noteworthy that it was not disputed from the floor at the time when the Vice President handed down his advisory opinion.

This position of the Vice President is supported by a number of precedents in the history of the Senate. Several of them were cited in the brief which the Senator from Illinois earlier asked to have included in the RECORD in connection with the remarks he made on this point. I do not wish to go into those precedents in detail, but I should like to ask unanimous consent that the summary of the precedents, which I shall hand to the clerk, be included in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement of precedents was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A. Precedent 1. The dismissal of the Senate Printer in 1841

A joint resolution of 1819 authorized each House of Congress to choose the printer for the next succeeding House; it provided the method, rights of pay, and other matters of detail. Pursuant to this joint resolution, the Democratic Senate in 1840 chose as Printer for the Senate of the following Congress (the 27th Congress) the firm of Blair & Rives. Mr. Blair was editor of the Washington Globe, an intensely partisan newspaper which supported the Democratic administration. The Whigs had given notice during the last days of the 2d session of the 26th Congress that they did not consider that the Democrats had any constitutional or moral right to choose a Printer for the next Congress. Despite these warnings, the Democratic Senate awarded the contract for the printing for the next Senate to Blair & Rives.

Immediately upon the opening of a special session of the Whig-controlled 27th Congress, Senator Mangum of North Carolina introduced a resolution that Blair & Rives be dismissed as Printer to the Senate (9 Cong. Globe p. 236). The resolution was heatedly opposed, largely on the authority of the established usage under the joint resolution of 1819. The opponents argued that a Printer had been elected 10 times under the authority of the resolution and that now, on the occasion of the 11th election, the unconstitutionality of the authorizing resolution was claimed too late. Senator Allen of Ohio, in a statement quoted several times during the 1953 Senate debates, summed up the position of those contending for the binding effect of the action of the previous Senate in these words:

"And as to the assertion that this was a new Senate, he denied the fact. * * * There was no such thing as a new Senate known to the Constitution of this Republic. They might as well speak of a new Supreme Court as of a new Senate."

Senator Buchanan and others supported Senator Allen, arguing for the theory of the Senate as a permanent and continuous body bound by the actions of the Senate of an earlier Congress.

Rejecting the appeals of Senators Allen, Buchanan, and the other Democrats, those in favor of the dismissal of the Printer, designated the resolution of 1819 as a nullity because it attempted to bind the actions of future Houses of Congress. The argument that the Senate of one Congress could not bind its successors prevailed; the resolution to dismiss the Printer was adopted 26 to 18.

In a word, the Senate of 1841 rejected the theory that the action of the Senate of one Congress could bind the Senate of a later Congress. The Senate rejected this theory in the face of the same arguments of permanence and continuity that are now being made by the supporters of rule XXII. Indeed, it is significant that Senator Taft, leading the battle against the Anderson motion in 1953, relied heavily upon the quotation from Senator Allen in the 1841 debate, despite the fact that Senator Allen's statement and his theory had been repudiated by a majority of the Senate when it voted to dismiss the Printer. In other words, those who relied upon the statements of Senators Allen, Buchanan, and their colleagues were relying upon the arguments of the defeated side; it was as though, in arguing to a court, a lawyer had relied upon a decision that had been overruled.

B. Precedent 2. Abrogation of the joint rules in 1876

The story of the abrogation of the joint rules and their relevance to the present issue was well stated in the leadership conference brief (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), and quoted in the 1957 brief submitted by Senators joining in the motion to take up rules (103 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 24, 26). We again quote that statement in full:

"In the first Congress the Senate and House adopted joint rules to govern the relationship and necessary business between them. Annals of Congress, 57–58, 987. Thereafter, these joint rules of the two Houses were treated as in force and revised and amended, although the Senate and House did not adopt them at the beginning of each Congress.

"In 1865, rule XXII of the joint rules was adopted in an attempt to settle the long-standing controversy on the method of counting electoral votes. In 1869, there was a violent quarrel between the two Houses of Congress over the effect of this particular joint rule. This led to a determination by a portion of the Senate to rescind that rule, in anticipation of any problems over the counting of electoral votes which might arise from the 1876 presidential election. (Haynes, op. cit. supra, p. 245 et seq.) The desire of the Senate to eliminate joint rule XXII led to the end of acquiescence of each new Senate in the continuation of the joint rules and the Senate in the 1st session of the 41st Congress, after 87 years of unbroken historical usage, demonstrated its right to adopt new joint rules at the beginning of each new Congress.

"On December 15, Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, introduced a resolution to adopt the joint rules in force at the close of the last session of Congress. Senator Byard, of Delaware, asked whether this was necessary, and Senator Edmunds answered:

" 'That, as a celebrated Englishman said, is past finding out. The object of this resolution is to ascertain from the proper Committee on Rules (which had jurisdiction over the joint rules as well as the Standing Rules of the Senate) whether the joint rules that were in force at the last session of Congress are in force now without any vote, and, if so, upon what principle of law or joint proceeding; and, if not, of course, to take some steps to have some joint rules between the two Houses' (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 220).

"The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, which reported it back favorably with a technical amendment making it a concurrent resolution. Senator Hamlin argued that the joint rules operated only by acquiescence (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 309). Considerable heated discussion ensued, in which widely different theories as to the effect and validity of the joint rules were stated. The one point receiving constant reiteration was that the joint rules had operated by acquiescence, and must be subject to change. Senator Hamlin, as he gave the committee report, stated it as follows:

" 'It is only by acquiescence in long years that they have been treated and regarded as rules, and not by an affirmative vote either of the House or of the Senate' (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 309).

"Recognition that common consent or acquiescence could give validity to that which was otherwise doubtful only so long as the acquiescence continued was voiced by Senator Merrimon, who said in the course of this debate (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 431–432):

" 'It seems, as the venerable Senator from Maine, Mr. Hamlin, stated on a former occasion, that this matter has passed uniformly from the beginning of the Government down to this time without question. The question is now raised, and if today some action of Congress should be required under the joint rules, and a Senator should rise and say, "I object," there would be the end of it. It is only by common consent that the practice to which I have referred has prevailed.'

"Despite the appeals to history, long-standing practice, and the venerability of the joint rules, the Senate voted to reject a substitute resolution which would have treated the rules as in force and provided for an amendment of those rules, and accepted the initial resolution which was framed on the theory that no joint rules existed at the opening of the new Congress (4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 519).

"Thus, the Senate passed a concurrent resolution adopting the joint rules anew for the 44th Congress. The House never passed this resolution. The Senate, at various times since then has made an effort to have joint rules passed but they never have succeeded. (Gilfrey, Precedents, 1914, p. P–441; Hinds, sections 6782–6787.) In most respects the House and Senate now operate in the same manner as they did under the joint rules on some theory of usage.

"The decision, by vote of the Senate, that the joint rules were not in effect demonstrated that the joint rules had existed only by acquiescence and that the acquiescence of even 87 years was in no way binding when a majority manifested its will to the contrary. It also showed conclusively that the method by which the majority in such a situation manifests its will is by the adoption of new rules and not by amendment of the old ones."

C. Precedent 3. Senator Walsh's resolution and arguments in 1917

At the opening of the 65th Congress in March 1917, Senators Owen, of Oklahoma, and Walsh, of Montana, raised the question whether the rules of the preceding Senate were binding upon the new body.

Senator Owen, on the first business day of the Senate of the new Congress, March 6, 1917, refused to permit a bill to be referred to committee on the ground that committees were not in existence at the beginning of this new Congress, and Senator Walsh supported Senator Owen's contention.

On March 7, Senator Walsh presented a resolution squarely raising the issue whether the rules carried over from Senate to Senate and presented his now famous argument against the old rules being applied to the Senate of the new Congress. Said the Senator: "A majority may adopt the rules in the first place. It is preposterous to assert that they may deny to future majorities the right to change them."

On the evening of March 7, after Senator Walsh's resolution and speech, caucuses of both parties voted to approve a change in rule XXII to provide for cloture by a two-thirds vote. The resolution was debated by unanimous consent without ever being referred to committee and was adopted on March 8, 1917 (76 yeas, 3 nays). Senator Walsh, who had accomplished his purpose of obtaining the cloture rule he sought, dropped his resolution.

At the opening of the 85th Congress on January 3, 1957, Senator ANDERSON and others again raised the question of whether the Senate had any rules in effect at this time. The events following Senator ANDERSON's motion to adopt rules are discussed in detail elsewhere in this brief and need not be repeated here.

On January 4, Senator HUMPHREY squarely raised the issue of whether the rules continue from one Congress to another by asking in a parliamentary inquiry "* * * under what rule is the Senate presently proceeding?" In response, the Vice President rendered his historic opinion, previously quoted in this brief, that the Senate, at the beginning of each Congress, has the power to adopt rules and that it has in effect done so, albeit by acquiescence in the rules of the previous Congress.

Although Senator JOHNSON's motion to table Senator ANDERSON's motion was successful on a vote, this was clearly no repudiation of the Vice President's opinion, since this contingency had been taken into consideration when the Vice President stated:

"Turning to the parliamentary situation in which the Senate now finds itself, if the motion to table should prevail, a majority of the Senate by such action will have indicated its approval of the previous rules of the Senate * * *.

"If, on the other hand, the motion to lay on the table fails, the Senate can proceed with the adoption of rules under whatever procedure the majority of the Senate approves."

There was no challenge to this evaluation of the parliamentary situation in the debate following the Vice President's opinion, although there was ample opportunity to do so, either in the debate itself or by making a point of order against the motion to adopt rules which would have placed the issue squarely before the Senate. Silence on this point may well be taken as tacit acceptance of this principle.

* * * * *

Thus, in the four closest precedents, the Senate, while some of its Members talked continuous body and others talked in a contrary vein, each time supported the right of the Senate to adopt new rules. The Printer was dismissed despite the argument that this could not be done in the face of the action of the Senate of the earlier Congress; new point rules were adopted despite the action and acquiescence of the Senate of the earlier Congresses; a new cloture rule was adopted by overwhelming agreement once the argument was made that the old rules did not carry over; and the Vice President's advisory opinion was received by the Senate, without challenge in subsequent debate.

The action of the Senate in 1933 and 1957, while admittedly not free from ambiguity, would also appear to be favorable precedents.

On January 3, 1953, Senator ANDERSON, on behalf of himself and 18 other Senators, moved that the Senate take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 83d Congress. If, in fact, the rules of the Senate of the earlier Congress had automatically carried over, this motion was out of order. Yet not a single member of the majority opposing the motion to take up rules raised a point of order against the motion, despite the fact that this would have been the proper parliamentary procedure if the group had cared to test out the question whether the old rules carried over. Instead of a point of order, the then majority leader, Senator Taft, moved to lay the motion on the table, an implicit recognition of the fact that the motion had been in order. Many Senators undoubtedly voted for the tabling motion because they sought to avoid any direct issue on the rules at that time, even though they would have supported a ruling by the Vice President that the resolution was in order.[1] Indeed, one such Senator, Senator Potter, stated subsequently that he voted to table because he did not want anything to interfere with the organization of the new administration and the confirmation of the new Cabinet (New York Times, Dec. 12, 1956, p. 31). No such issue is presently before the Senate.

The effect of the motion to table was well stated by Senator Lehman at the conclusion of the debate in 1953:

"The adoption of the motion to table the resolution of the Senator from New Mexico is implicit recognition of the fact that our main contention that each Senate has the constitutional right to adopt its own rules is sound.[2] No point of order was raised against the Anderson motion. A majority of the Senate has laid that motion on the table. I believe the opposition did not dare to raise a point of order because of the fear that such a point against the Anderson motion would have been overruled. * * * I believe it to be an incontrovertible fact that the Senate has the constitutional right—even the obligation—to adopt its own rules at the beginning of a new Congress. It is incontrovertible because the right to do so is expressly set forth in the Constitution. It is moreover, basically inherent in the nature of a democratic parliamentary body" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 232).

On January 3, 1957, Senator ANDERSON made a similar motion on behalf of himself and 30 other Senators, and the ensuing events closely paralleled those of 1953. Thus the same implications stated by Senator Lehman to apply to the 1953 motion to table apply equally to the 1957 motion. They both demonstrate that the opposition did not wish to face that issue.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, there have been repeated statements that until 1917 there was no cloture in the Senate, no limitation on debate. The fact is that so-called unlimited debate in the Senate is a myth. History shows clearly that up to the time of the Civil War a majority of the Senate, under its rules and precedents, and under the dignity of its customs, did have the authority to, and for the most part effectively did, limit debate and prevent filibusters. The Senate did it by insisting that Senators confine their remarks and speeches to the question at issue, and that they conduct themselves in a manner in keeping with the traditional courtesy and dignity of a Senator. There may be exceptions, but the truly representative picture of the Senate before the Civil War, as shown by our historical records, is that the body observed dignity and restraint in debate, and did not consider talking to consume time a parliamentary instrument appropriate for the Senate. When delays by speech were tolerated, the Senators engaged in such dilatory tactics either kept their talks germane or the majority did not choose to insist on the strict observance of the rules and precedents.

In short, the evidence clearly shows that the filibuster as a device, not merely to delay, but to prevent, action is a modern institution which has no support or sanction in early Senate history and practice.

I could go on at great length in demonstration of the correctness of the statements I have just made and in producing evidence as to the precedents and history of debate in the Senate. I do not wish to delay my colleagues in addressing themselves to the question at this time, but I ask respectfully that they refer to several documents on the point. One of them is the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration in the 85th Congress on Senate Resolution 17. That report was made in two parts. Both of them are pertinent to these questions, which are discussed in great detail.

I should also like to refer my colleagues to the remarks I, and other Senators, made last July, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 28 and 29, 1958, when we discussed all these questions at great length. We showed, conclusively, I believe, that the idea of unlimited debate, in the sense of debate for the purpose of preventing action by a majority of this body, is not and never has been a tradition of the Senate in any historical and honored sense; that it is a practice of modern origin, and was unheard of prior to the Civil War.

Mr. President, there are several other points I should like to make, briefly, before yielding.

Everybody concedes that the Senate has the right to adopt rules by majority vote, and to change rules by majority vote—a right inherent in the nature of this body and expressed in the Constitution. Simple logic and commonsense dictate that there has to be as an inherent part of that right, the right of a majority to prevent a minority from interfering with the majority's exercise of that right. Unless we concede that a minority has the right to prevent a majority from the majority's exercise of its power and duty to adopt rules, then a majority has that power. Therefore, inherent in the power to adopt rules is the power to bring to a close a filibuster or unlimited debate on the part of a minority which would prevent the majority

[1] It is generally believed that such a ruling would have been forthcoming had a point of order been raised and the Vice President given the opportunity to rule. Actually Vice President Barkley made a partial ruling to this effect when he stated, in connection with the election of officers, that "the organization of the Senate is an inherent right of the Senate, as it is of any sovereign body, and all that has taken place up to date has been under that inhert right" (99 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD). Had the rules actually carried over from the previous Congress, the election of officers would have taken place under these rules, not under "inherent right."

[2] Senator Lehman's interpretation of the action of the Senate in 1953 appears to be more accurate than that contained in the Watkins committee report in 1954. Furthermore, the entire discussion of the question of continuing body in the Watkins report was irrelevant to its conclusion that a Senator can properly be censured for actions occurring during a prior term as Senator. The Senate's power to censure arises from the necessity of maintaining the dignity and good repute of the Senate and, therefore, the authority to censure exists as long as a Senator is a Member of the Senate and exists by virtue of his presence in the Senate. Indeed, the same rule that past conduct may be considered for censure and expulsion purposes applied in the House (2 Hinds, Precedents, sec. 1286; H. Rept. No. 570, 63d Cong., 2d sess., 1914), whose rules do not carry over from Congress to Congress.

from effectively carrying out that power. This is an essential power, particularly in the beginning of a session. Then, as everyone knows, there is much business waiting to be done, important business which has accumulated during the time when the Congress has not been in session. Then the pressures upon us to act in carrying out our constitutional mandate to legislate, are very great, and properly so. Then the power of obstruction of a minority can be very effectively applied at a time when all of us, and the country, are anxious to get to work on legislative responsibilities, and, in the Senate, executive duties as well. More than at any other time during our sessions and deliberations, it is essential that at the beginning of each session the Senate have the power, by majority vote, after reasonable debate, to bring to a close and to bring to action the question of the Senate's adoption of the rules of its procedure for the session which will follow.

Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD one further statement. I ask unanimous consent that an editorial which appeared in the New York Times of January 7, 1959, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MAJORITY HAS RIGHTS TOO

When the Senate organizes for business today it will have before it a proposal by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, supported by other liberal Senators, to permit the majority, after a decent interval for reflection and debate, to get on with the country's business. This proposal is perhaps the most important single subject that will come before either House of the 86th Congress. Senator DOUGLAS and his associates propose that rule XXII be amended so that a simple majority of the whole Senate may impose cloture after 15 days. After this interval debate could continue until each Senator had had an ample chance to speak, but a filibuster could not continue. The whole process of bringing a measure to vote over the opposition of an entrenched minority might take a month or more, but at the end of that time a vote could be had and the majority would prevail.

We admit the existence of honest arguments against this reform. There are those who fear that unwise legislation may be steamrollered through Congress. But the choice seems to us to be between a reasonable delay and a reasonable amount of discussion, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the actual rule of a minority. It is easy to find arguments against what has been called the tyranny of the majority, but the tyranny of the minority is and always has been infinitely worse. For instance, there is no reason under heaven why a minority in the South or anywhere else should prevent this Nation from enacting a modern bill of civil rights.

There will be an effort in the House of Representatives to reduce the power of the Rules Committee, which now is usually able to put bills in the deep freeze and keep them there. This machinery, which the leadership of the lower House controls, has the same result that rule XXII effectuates in the Senate—namely, to prevent bills which a minority dislikes from being brought to the floor at all. But the situation in the House, with SAM RAYBURN in the Speaker's chair, is not as bad as the situation in the Senate with an unamended rule XXII.

The election wave of last November was not merely a Democratic wave, it was also an expression of a reviving liberalism. We shall be deeply disappointed if this liberalism does not reveal itself in a democratic revision of rule XXII.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the proposal that the Senate adopt new rules involves considerably more than a mere question of the procedure to be followed in this Chamber.

Its ramifications extend to the very heart of our form of government and candor compels the conclusion that the effect of its approval would be to repudiate the Senate's assigned constitutional role.

It is vital, therefore, Mr. President, that this question be resolved not from the standpoint of any transient advantage which might accrue to some partisan group but rather on the basis of its implications for the future of constitutional, republican government in this Nation.

The United States Senate, in the light of history and the Constitution, is much more than another legislative body.

It is, in reality, a continuing council of States sitting as an integral part of the Federal establishment—a protective repository on the national level for the sovereignty of the sovereign States.

It was with plain design that our Founding Fathers created it as a watchman over all operations of our National Government.

And it was with deliberate intent that they conferred upon it the broadest powers to act as a checkmate on unwarranted centralization of authority.

Our far-seeing forefathers well realized that the House of Representatives would be both too large and too impermanent to fulfill those desired objectives.

They knew there could never be free debate in the House and that important bills would pass that Chamber without sufficient study and deliberation.

And, perceiving those problems, they put their faith in the United States Senate and bestowed upon it the major responsibility for keeping faith with posterity.

To this date the Senate has kept that faith and I am humbly proud, Mr. President, to have the privilege of sitting in this honored body which has so faithfully discharged its appointed constitutional duty to serve as a bridge between the States and the Nation and a liaison between the past and the future.

The Senate has afforded continuity and stability to our Government.

The Senate has stood as a bulwark against usurpations of power.

Since it first effected its organization on April 6, 1789, there has not been a time in our national history when the Senate was not available as an organized body to answer the summons of the President and to fulfill its responsibilities in the transaction of public business.

Its first rules, adopted only 10 days after the Senate came into being, have continued in force without reaffirmation until amended or abolished by the Senate.

The Senate has proved itself worthy of the rules which have governed it for the past 169 years.

And common sense dictates that they should not be subjected to whimsical tampering on the slightest provocation as it now is being insisted that we of this 86th Congress do.

At the outset, Mr. President, it is important that this Senate face the reality that the true purpose of those who would have it renounce its constitutional continuity is their desire to use that renunciation as a vehicle for destroying freedom of debate in this Chamber.

They are attacking not only the Senate itself but also the stature, perquisites and prerogatives of each Senator in national affairs and every other responsibility incident to the senatorship.

It is an attack which threatens the whole fabric of our form of government.

It is an attack which strikes at the very vitals of representative government.

It is an attack which aims a death blow to the States as political entities.

Mr. President, it is with sincere emphasis that I submit that we are not dealing here with constructive evolution in the rules of the Senate.

To the contrary, the proposals that the Senate adopt new rules and impose gag rule on its Members are nothing short of destructive revolution for this body and its unique and essential governmental role.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I would warn this body that if the Senate elects to surrender on this issue, its action will mark the beginning of a sustained campaign to destroy the Senate as an institution of government.

The assaults next will turn to the seniority system and all of the other safeguards which have given stability and responsibility to the Senate of the United States.

In fact, one of the witnesses before the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration in 1951 made it very clear in his testimony that the next target in the shooting gallery of his organization is the seniority system by which the Senate presently operates.

It would be a grave mistake to overlook the patent dangers ahead for the Senate and its individual members if we abandon its time-tested rules.

Should minority rights ever be trampled in the Senate there will remain only one remedy to those who do not happen at any given time to be a member of the majority; that is, affiliation with a multiplicity of splinter parties.

And I can think of no greater catastrophe befalling our Nation than the destruction of our two-party system.

It does not take much vision to see that under such circumstances any small militant minority exercising a balance of power could be thrust into a position where it could inflict great harm on the country.

Since its establishment the Senate of the Unitd States has refused to be bound in a straitjacket.

Despite the protestations of some of its detractors, the Senate enjoys the respect and admiration of the masses of this Nation and of the world.

The Senate is looked upon as a guardian of American liberties.

Mr. President, I consider this attack on the rules of the U.S. Senate far more serious than the fundamental constitutional objections to proposed force bills in the field of civil rights.

Under the guise of agitating for passage of such legislation, efforts are being made to alter our form of government.

It is not amiss to observe that throughout the course of history tyrants have seized power through the camouflage of some allegedly worthwhile cause.

The very groups which today are advocating the imposition of gag rule in the Senate very well may be the first to suffer under it when the pendulum of national politics swings.

The sum and substance of all good legislation can be stated in one simple rule.

It is a rule about which all Americans should know.

It is the rule that under no circumstances should extreme and far-reaching Federal legislation affecting the basic rights of all the people of the Nation be adopted without substantial unanimity and support of all citizens.

National legislation should reflect mature, careful, and deliberate thought and discussion.

And, above all else, it should be conducive to unity, not division and disruption among our people.

Over the years the continuing goal of the Senate has been to promote such unity.

When we hear the cry of "majority rule" by proponents of majority cloture we should take into account a few simple facts about the origin and composition of the Senate.

It is impossible to apply to this body with any degree of accuracy the principle of popular majority rule as we usually consider it. The very composition of the U.S. Senate where all States have an equal vote prevents such an application.

It is possible for various combinations of 50 Senators to represent anywhere from 20 to 80 percent of the country's population.

All of the great injustices of history have been committed in the name of unchecked and unbridled majority rule.

The late Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, in one of the most forceful speeches ever delivered before the Senate, observed with great truth that:

> The majority crucified Jesus Christ.
> The majority burned the Christians at the stake.
> The majority drove the Jews into exile and to ghetto.
> The majority established slavery.
> The majority chained to stakes and surrounded with circles of flame martyrs through all the ages of the world's history.
> The majority jeered when Columbus said the world was round.
> The majority threw him into a dungeon for having discovered a new world.
> The majority said that Galileo must recant or that Galileo must go to prison.
> The majority cut off the ears of John Pym because he dared advocate the liberty of the press.

Representatives of the various partisan groups advocating this change have offered lengthy testimony and voluminous briefs purporting to show the circumstances attendant to the adoption of our Constitution and the creation of the United States Senate.

No doubt if Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay could return to the scene today they would be shocked at how some of their writings have been distorted out of context.

Two good examples of that can be found in a brief filed in 1951 by proponents of majority cloture.

In that brief excerpts from letters by Hamilton in "The Federalist" are quoted in support of their position.

An examination of those quotations in light of their context and the language of the whole series of letters discloses such to be a complete distortion of truth.

The entire spirit of "The Federalist" and its elucidation regarding the foundation of the Senate cries out for the maintenance of freedom of debate in this body.

Properly assaying the true meaning of "The Federalist" requires an understanding of the times in which the letters comprising it were written.

It must be borne in mind that Hamilton and the other patriots of that day were writing about inadequacies of the loosely drawn Articles of Confederation and in favor of the adoption of a clear-cut new Constitution. In the quotations attributed to Hamilton in the brief to which I have referred, he was detracting from the Articles of Confederation in a concerted effort to convince the people that the new Constitution was good for the country and should be ratified by the States.

One of the quotations attributed to Hamilton in that brief was taken from Letter XXII in which he stressed the weakness of the requirement that legislation adopted by the Continental Congress receive the approval of three-fourths of all the States.

The quotation, while applicable to that situation, hardly can rightly be applied to free debate in the Senate.

The other quotation attributed to Hamilton, which proponents of majority cloture claim supports their position, refers to the treatymaking power and other resolutions. There must have been strong sentiment for a constitutional two-thirds requirement before Senate approval, for Hamilton sought to allay the fears of the people by urging the view that a simple two-thirds would be sufficient in such circumstances for protection against abuses.

By no stretch of the imagination can the language quoted from Hamilton in Letter LXXV be applied to the fundamental right of a State to be heard from fully through its Senators in Senate debate.

Thus, Mr. President, it is the grossest distortion when we have those of the present seeking to apply the words of the great patriots of the past in an effort to detract from the Constitution and the principles of government which they established, when, in reality, those quotations when written were in reference to the Articles of Confederation.

It behooves us to examine carefully the Articles of Confederation, the Constitutional Convention and the Constitution itself. And, if we are to arrive at a proper perspective and present a true reflection of the facts surrounding the origin of our constitutional form of government and the place of the United States Senate in it, we must consider each in the light of the other and the conditions prevailing at the time.

The Articles of Confederation, standing alone, proved insufficient for successful operation of a central government.

Each State had one vote in the Continental Congress.

And on most major issues a three-fourths vote of all States was required.

The States and their people were wary of the tyrannny of central governments and despotic rulers. They were, by instinct, hesitant to surrender any portion of their newly won sovereign powers and their blood-won liberties.

The price at which they agreed to surrender a portion of them was the creation of the United States Senate.

We must remember that the delegates to the Constitutional Convention were chosen either by the Governors or the legislators of their States. They were instructed to press for either revision or amendment of the Articles of Confederation; but, in no event, to give up the principle of sovereignty and equality of the States.

Though the Articles of Confederation afforded no basis for a worthwhile scheme of amendment or revision, many of the delegates nonetheless held fast to the principle that any new Constitution must include equality of State representation.

From first to last the Convention stood for the protection of private economic interests, a stronger central authority, a stabilized monetary system, orderly legal processes, and a republican form of government; but not for an unlimited democracy.

The motivating spirit of the Convention—not expressed, but clearly understood—was to make the Nation safe from unlimited democracy. Madison's own notes, as well as the papers of most of the other delegates, make such an intention unmistakable.

But, Mr. President, there remains one obvious defect in our Constitution.

There is nothing in the document to prevent the United States Senate from surrendering its powers and prerogatives by its own action.

Its only protection in that regard rests with the courage, conscience, and patriotism of its individual members and their collective determination to preserve the integrity of the senatorship.

Now, as we proceed to an examination of the origin of the Government of the United States, let us first dispose of one salient misconception.

Our country is a new experiment in government.

It is not a pure democracy.

It is not a pure republic.

Our national structure is a product of compromise.

It is a mixture of necessity.

It was welded by great men.

It is not like any other government on this earth.

It is strictly ours.

While the question of the ratification and adoption of the new Constitution was before the people of the country Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay—over the common pseudonym of "Publius"—wrote and published in the press of that day a series of 94 articles explaining the various passages of the new instrument.

Those essays are unrivaled in the whole mass of constitutional literature for clarity, power, and illumination.

After their appearance they were brought together and published in one volume entitled "The Federalist."

That volume is recognized by historians as the most authoritative source of contemporaneous interpretation and construction of the origin of the United States Constitution.

For an exposition of the precise effects of this new form of government, we must turn to Letter IX by Alexander Hamilton as it appears in the 1877 edition of "The Federalist." In it he wrote:

> The proposed Constitution, so far from implying an abolition of the State governments, makes them constituent parts of the national sovereignty, by allowing them a direct representation in the Senate, and leaves in their possession certain exclusive and very important portions of sovereign power.

Hamilton was joined in that view by Madison who later wrote in Letter XLV as follows:

> The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; whilst the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former.

Our Government was never purely national in character where unlimited majorities might trample a helpless minority.

It is not that today.

James Madison in Letter XXXIX of "The Federalist" cited several propositions of constitutional construction to prove that point, concluding in these words:

> The proposed Constitution, therefore, even when tested by the rules laid down by its antagonists, is, in strictness, neither a national nor a federal Constitution, but a composition of both.

Madison explained that ratification of the Constitution by sovereign States was a federal act; representation in the House, a national act; representation in the Senate, a federal act; election of the executive, a compound national-federal act, with emphasis on the former; in exercising its delegated powers, a federal act; and in amending the Constitution, again a compound national-federal act.

Those, Mr. President, are the checks and balances written into the organic law to protect the people, to protect the people's rights and to protect the sovereignty of the several States.

Discussing the sources from which the powers of government were to be derived, Madison said of Congress:

> The House of Representatives will derive its powers from the people of America, and the people will be represented in the same proportion, and on the same principle as they are in any legislature of a particular State.
> The Senate, on the other hand, will derive its powers from the States, as political and co-equal societies; and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate, as they are in the existing Congress.

Mr. President, let us observe that language closely. It says "as they are in the existing Congress."

That was the Continental Congress and we know that it was based, without exception, on equality of the States as sovereign entities.

And that is the heritage of the Senate.

Thus, as I already have pointed out, the Senate was—and the Senate today is—the great repository of State sovereignty on the national level.

So-called majority rule, cloture, and unlimited democracy are as foreign to the constitutional concept of this body as it is possible to be.

What then, Mr. President, is the origin of the United States Senate?

It was created as the result of compromise.

The delegates to the Constitutional Convention were deadlocked hopelessly over the Virginia plan which was favored by the larger States and the Jersey plan which has the support of the less populous States.

Out of that conflict came a suggestion for resolving the differences. Dr. William Samuel Johnson, of Connecticut, according to the Secret Debates of the Convention, was the first to take the floor; and, in the course of his remarks, made a suggestion which subsequently was adopted and gave a leading character to the Constitution.

It appears to me,

He observed, > that the Jersey plan has for its principal object, the preservation of State governments. * * * I could have wished that the supporters of the Jersey system could have satisfied themselves with the principles of the Virginia plan; and that the individuality of the States could be supported. It is agreed that on all hands, that a portion of the government is to be left to the States. How can this be done? It can be done by joining the States in their legislative capacity with the right of appointing the second branch of the legislature to represent the States individually.

With those words, Mr. President, was born the plan for the creation within the National Government of a protective repository for the sovereign powers of the sovereign States.

The discussion which followed that important suggestion naturally related to the make up and composition of the Senate.

James Madison urged that the Senate be so constituted as to have "permanency and stability."

Alexander Hamilton had this cogent appraisal as progress was being made toward the new Government:

> We are now forming a republican government. Real liberty is neither found in despotism, nor in the extremes of democracy, but in moderate governments.

That, Mr. President, is the very genesis of the U.S. Senate.

That, Mr. President, is what we are being asked to destroy here today.

It is interesting to note at this juncture that, after the close of debate on the subject, the States were divided five to five with the vote of Maryland split.

To resolve that impasse, a committee of compromise consisting of one member from each State was appointed. Its report, which was adopted by the Convention, declared that the first branch of the National Legislature should represent the people and that, in the Senate, "each State shall have an equal vote."

Which brings us to the consideration of the questions of whether the U.S. Senate is a continuing body and whether the Senate is the sole judge of the rules under which it functions.

"The Federalist" sheds important light on those subjects.

For instance, Hamilton in Letter LXII stressed that the Senate is more than just an appendage of the House. He alluded to the qualifications required of Senators and the nature of the senatorial trust as contradistinguished from membership in the lower branch.

He wrote of the Senate with great wisdom:

> The mutability in the public councils, arising from a rapid succession of new members, however qualified they may be, points out, in the strongest manner, the necessity of some stable institution in the Government.
> The internal effects of a mutable policy are calamitous. It poisons the blessings of liberty itself. * * *
> The want of confidence in the public councils, damps every useful undertaking; the success and profit of which may depend on a continuance of existing arrangements.
> * * * No government, any more than an individual, will long be respected, without being truly respectable, without possessing a portion of order and stability.

Commenting further along that same line in Letter LXIII on the permanence of the Senate as a continuing institution, Hamilton said:

> The objects of government may be divided into two general classes; the one depending on measures which have singly an immediate and sensible operation; the other depending on a succession of well-chosen and well-connected measures, which have gradual and perhaps unobserved operation. The importance of the latter description to the collective and permanent welfare of every country, needs no explanation.
> An assembly (the House of Representatives) elected for so short a term (2 years) as to be unable to provide more than one to two links in a chain of measures, on which the general welfare may essentially depend, ought not to be answerable for the final result, any more than a steward or tenant, engaged for one year, could be justly made to answer for plans or improvements, which could not be accomplished in less than half a dozen years.
> The proper remedy for this defect, must be an additional body in the legislative department, which, having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention, and a train of measures, may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects.

Now, Mr. President, those words adequately describe the role of the Senate and prove beyond all doubt the deliberate intent of the framers of our Government to create it as a continuing body.

Let us listen further to Hamilton's words from the same letter:

As the cool and deliberate sense of the community ought in all governments, and actually will in all free governments, ultimately prevail over the views of its rulers; so there are particular moments in public affairs, when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion, or some illicit advantage, or misled by the artful misrepresentations of interested men, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be the most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments, how salutary will be the interference of some temperate and respectable body of citizens, in order to check the misguided career, and to suspend the blow meditated by the people against themselves, until reason, justice, and truth, can regain their authority over the public mind?

We do not have to wonder, Mr. President, of what time he spoke.

This is that hour.

I read further from Letter LXII which emphasizes that the Senate is more than an "upper house":

I am not unaware of the circumstances which distinguish the American from other popular governments, ancient as well as modern. * * * Many of the defects, as we have seen, which can only be supplied by a senatorial institution, are common to a numerous assembly frequently elected by the people, and to the people themselves. * * * The people can never willfully betray their own interests; but they may possibly be betrayed in the hands of one body of men, than where the concurrence of separate and dissimilar bodies is required in every public act.

We must not forget, Mr. President, that our Constitution may very likely have been rejected had it not been for the explanations of its true meaning as set forth in The Federalist.

A further evidence of the intention of the framers of our Constitution to create the Senate as a permanent and continuing body is found in the Constitution itself—in article II, section II, paragraph 3 which confers on the President the "power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate."

I would call the particular attention of the Members of this body, Mr. President, to the use by the framers of the word "recess" rather than the word "adjournment" in describing the periods during which the Senate would not be in session.

It would be well in this connection for us to refer to the legal definition of the word "recess."

In the case of State ex rel. Landis, Attorney General v. Thompson (170 So. 464, 125 Fla. 466), the Supreme Court of Florida set forth this definition:

A "recess" operates to continue the assembly in sesssion pursuant to its original convocation but with the interposition of an interval in its program of parliamentary business during which the membership must remain within call of the presiding officers and are not permitted to disperse but are required to remain available to be called to order for resumption of parliamentary business when the period agreed upon for the recess has expired.

And the Court of Appeals of New York put it this way in the case of Reynolds v. Cropsey (150 N.E. 303, 241 N.Y. 389):

A recess of a term of court decisively and inevitably indicates a temporary suspension of its proceedings. It denotes that its proceedings have been suspended for a short time for some purpose, and everybody having business with it naturally understands that, after such brief suspension, it will resume its proceedings.

It is only logical to assume, therefore, Mr. President, that our Founding Fathers considered the Senate to be a permanent and continuing body which would be available for service at the call of the President at any time.

As a matter of fact the Supreme Court of the United States so held in 1926 in the case of McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U.S. 135). In that instance, it ruled:

The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Now, as to the question of whether the rules of the Senate carry over from session to session and are permanent, valid and subsisting until changed by proper procedure, let us look to John Jay for information. He provided us with the incontrovertible answer in letter LXIV of "The Federalist."

It was wise, therefore, in the (constitutional) convention to provide, not only that the power of making treaties should be committed to able and honest men, but also that they should continue in place of a sufficient time to become perfectly acquainted with our national concerns, and to form and introduce a system for the management of them. The duration prescribed, is such as will give them an opportunity of greatly extending their political information, and of rendering their accumulating experience more and more beneficial to their country.

Nor has the convention discovered less prudence in providing for the frequent elections of Senators in such a way, as to obviate the inconvenience of periodically transferring these great affairs entirely to new men—for, by leaving a considerable residue of the old ones in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information will be preserved.

That language shatters once and for all time the contention that the life of the Senate is only 2 years and that its rules must be altered from session to session.

Furthermore, the Senate itself has twice during this decade reaffirmed the continuing status of the Senate and its rules—by a vote of 70 to 21 at the beginning of the 1st session of the 83d Congress in 1953 and by a vote of 55 to 38 at the beginning of the 1st session of the 85th Congress in 1957.

Mr. President, the system "formed and introduced" in the Senate to manage and resolve grave issues of national concern has served the country well.

The tragic inconvenience of periodic upheaval in this institution of the Government has been prevented and "uniformity and order" have been insured.

How has this been done?

There can be only one answer in the light of history.

It is that the Senate has functioned through wise and just rules which have withstood the tortuous test of time.

And the guarantee of free debate for all its Members is the most important of them.

If there were any doubt about that point, the Founding Fathers resolved it by writing into the Constitution in article I, section V, paragraph 2 that each House is sole judge in determining the rules of its proceedings.

We have seen from the quotations I have read from "The Federalist" that the Senate is not an "upper house" of the Congress in any sense of the word.

The Senate exercises quasi-executive functions in relation to the treatymaking power.

The Senate sits as a judicial body in impeachment proceedings.

The Senate must give its advice and consent to the appointments of the Executive.

The Senate is the safeguard of State sovereignty on the national level.

The point has been made that the Senate's cloture rule is more liberal than the similar rules of most State senates.

The truth of the matter is that the Senate of the United States cannot legitimately be compared in any terms with either State senates or with assemblies of foreign nations.

To attempt to make such comparisons is to misconstrue totally the unique position which the United States Senate occupies in our Federal-State structure.

It is essential to our interests as a Nation that we keep vital and inviolate our system of checks and balances of which the continuing nature of the Senate and freedom of debate within it are integral parts.

With continuity of direction and unlimited debate in the United States Senate, all Americans have the assurance that no act jeopardizing their rights ever will be proposed without some Member of the Senate having the opportunity to resist it and to warn the Nation of its consequences.

Those who would cite Thomas Jefferson as their authority for gagging the Senate can get no comfort from his actual words on the subject.

In Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Procedure, he wrote:

The rules of the Senate which allow full freedom of debate are designed for protection of the minority, and this design is a part of the warp and woof of our Constitution. You cannot remove it without damaging the whole fabric. Therefore, before tampering with this right, we should assure ourselves that what is lost will not be greater than what is gained.

Another quotation from Jefferson contained in the preface to his manual reads as follows:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say it was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or departure from, the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power. So far the maxim is certainly true and is founded in good sense; that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and have become the law of the House, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

And whether these forms be in all cases the most rational or not, is really not of so great importance. It is much more material that there should be a rule to go by, than what that rule is; that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business not subject to the caprice of the Speaker or captiousness of the members. It is very material that order, decency, and regularity be preserved in a dignified public body.

On a subsequent occasion, Jefferson had this to say concerning the protection of minority interests:

Bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will to be rightful, must be reasonable; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate would be oppression.

There has been much ado about the early rules of the Senate having included authority for moving the previous question.

Though such was the case, the rule was carried over automatically from the Continental Congress and, after being used only four times in 22 years, was discarded during Jefferson's term as President.

It would be wrong to conclude that cloture could be imposed in the Senate during that period through a motion for the previous question. To the contrary, such a motion was debatable and consequently did not have the effect of limiting debate.

It is argued by the opponents of free debate that here in the Senate of the United States is the only place in the world where gag rule does not prevail.

My answer to that, Mr. President, is "So what."

The patriots who established this Government were free men and did not elect to surrender their new and hard-won liberties nor to copy the governments of foreign lands where freedom either did not exist or came and went with the political tide.

Through the medium of free debate, Mr. President, the Senate provides the machinery by which all measures affecting the lives, fortunes, and sacred honor of the American people can be put to the critical test of unhurried examination by the collective intellect of a body expressly created as one of our governmental checks and balances.

Those who would destroy that right contend it imperils democracy and thwarts the wishes of the majority. In their zeal they forget that its very purpose is to provide a restraint upon the abuses of unbridled majority rule and, even more important, to protect the rights of the minorities of this Nation.

Our wise Founding Fathers were aware that the excesses of democracy can be as fearful in their consequences as are the excesses of totalitarianism. To safeguard against both extremes they gave us our republican form of government with its delicately contrived system of checks and balances of which freedom of debate in the Senate is at least an implied, if not actual, part.

Now is no time to forget the lessons of history.

If the United States Senate commits suicide by repudiating the continuity of its rules or by moving another step closer to majority cloture, we will see the day when it is regarded by the American people as nothing more than a useless appendage of the House of Representatives.

As a newcomer, but one who has worked long and hard to be entrusted by my fellow Georgians with a seat here, I fear for the future of this institution if the stature of its continuing nature is diminished or if freedom of speech in it is further curtailed.

Before tearing down a Chamber that has served the United States and its people well, Senators should search for truth by asking:

"Will we destroy the checks and balances so obviously afforded under our present system?

"Are we so blind as not to realize that if free debate perishes in the Senate that our leaders in the future will be rising like jacks-in-the-box to move the previous question?

"Do we not know that this evil thing will become the weapon of the majority party or coalition to be resorted to habitually in stifling all opposition?

"Do we not know that when such an event comes to pass that minority thought and opinion will lie prostrate and defenseless against the tyrannical abuses of any transient majority that might for the moment occupy the seats of the Senate?

"Have we forgotten that everyone, at one time or another, belongs to a minority?

"Have we lost sight of the unchanging truth that unbridled majority sway without proper restraint is mob rule?

"Are our memories so short that we have forgotten the maxim that free government destroying dissenting opinion, thereby destroys itself?

"Have we forgotten that in such circumstances dictatorship of one form or another steps into the vacuum thus created to wrest all rights from the people, minorities and majorities alike?"

The alternative to unlimited debate is gag rule which was aptly defined by the late Senator Reed as "the last resort of the legislative scoundrel."

The issue at stake here is far more fundamental than any mere question of legislation. It is as basic as freedom itself. Gag rule, and its stepchild, censorship, are abhorrent to and incompatible with our American heritage.

Franklin D. Roosevelt, while Governor of New York, foresaw just such dangers to the Republic, in a radio address on States rights, delivered March 2, 1930, when he warned:

The moment a mere numerical superiority by either States or voters in this country proceeds to ignore the needs and desires of the minority, and, for their own selfish purposes or advancement, hamper or oppress that minority or debar them in any way from equal privileges and equal rights—that moment will mark the failure of our constitutional system.

His warning, valid then, is even more so today.

It is a concern Americans share fullest in this hour.

It is a concern which the Senate can ignore only at its own peril.

It is a concern which the Senate can allay only by upholding the continuity of all its rules as they are written.

Let no man forget that central governments of general and unlimited power are like the grave. They cry incessantly: Give! Give! Give!

Mr. President, freedom is a fragile flower and must be tended by the people and their spokesmen in this Senate with that close watchfulness necessary to keep our Government responsive at all times to the will of the people.

Mr. President, I hold fealty for both my State and my Nation.

In no instance has there even been any conflict or problem in that for me for I know, Mr. President—as every loyal American knows—that what is best for my State also is best for the country as a whole.

That is the reason, Mr. President, that I shall vote to uphold the integrity of the Senate as a continuing repository of State sovereignty and as an instrumentality through which individual freedoms are protected in the manner envisioned by the men who founded this great Nation.

The prayer of all Americans who cherish their freedom and their form of government will be, Mr. President, that the majority of the Senate will vote likewise.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. I read a great many editorials and a great many columns and hear a great many remarks of commentators on the radio which accuse those of us who happen to represent States in the South with the capacity to prevent the passage of legislation. There are in the Senate 98 Members, are there not?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator from North Carolina is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. There are only 22 Senators from the Southern States, even in those rare cases when none of the 22 secede from the Confederacy.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. If all 22 Senators from the Southern States were to stand together they would constitute only 22.45 percent of the membership of the Senate, whereas the other 76 Senators from other areas would constitute 77.55 percent of the membership of the Senate.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Does the Senator from Georgia think that the southern Senators, who are used so often as whipping boys by columnists, editorial writers, and others, and who constitute 22.45 percent of the membership of the Senate, can be justly convicted of having the power to thwart the will of the other 77.55 percent of the Senate?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct. To sustain a filibuster requires one more than one-third of the Senate; and, as the Senator has so ably pointed out, if all the southern Senators were to unite, which they have never done since I have been a Member of the Senate, and make every effort to sustain a filibuster, they would not have sufficient numbers to do so.

I have been a Member of this honorable body only 2 years. The only filibusters I have seen in the Senate were conducted by Senators who said they were opposed to filibusters. Undoubtedly the Senator has noticed the same thing.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator agree that there is no validity in the premise that the rules of the Senate must be changed on this point in order to prevent the 22.45 percent of southern Senators from thwarting the will of the other 77.55 percent of the Members of the Senate?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct. The thinking is wholly fallacious; and I might add, as the Senator so well knows, that if we were to establish a policy of voting every 2 years that the Senate had no rules whatever, even though such rules have been in effect since 1789, a period of 169 years, and have been confirmed by every Senate since that time, including among the membership such men as John C. Calhoun and other able Members who have served from 1789 to date, and even though such rules have been approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, instead of being the United States Senate, this body would suddenly become a mob of 98 men.

Mr. ERVIN. The able and distinguished junior Senator from Georgia has, to my knowledge, made a very profound study of this entire question, and also the history relating to the subject.

Mr. TALMADGE. We endeavored to do so in a subcommittee of the Committee on Rules and Administration. The subcommittee held hearings for several weeks during the 85th Congress. One hundred and thirty-four witnesses appeared before the subcommittee, either in person or by way of statements. Representatives of such organizations as the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and many other organizations testified in favor of the rules of the United States Senate as written.

Mr. ERVIN. I think the colloquy between the Senator from Georgia and myself has demonstrated the fact that the mountain has been in labor and has brought forth one nonsensical mouse, namely, the absolutely invalid premise that 22.45 percent of the membership of the Senate, consisting of Senators from Southern States, can thwart the will of the other 77.55 percent. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he has noticed a great amount of argument in editorials and heard arguments over the radio, to the effect that the reason some drastic change in the Senate rules is needed is that rule XXII has been used either exclusively or almost exclusively to prevent the passage of so-called civil rights legislation.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct. They go even further with the proposal which is now pending before the Senate. They think they have apprehended a mouse in the barn, and they believe that the way to eradicate the mouse is to burn down the barn.

Mr. ERVIN. Exactly. Has not the Senator from Georgia learned, as a result of his study of this subject, that since 1850 there have been approximately 45 or 50 filibusters in the Senate, excluding from consideration filibusters which were conducted by Senators who said they were opposed to filibusters, and who were merely engaging in unlimited educational debate?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. If we were to add the filibusters conducted under the name of educational debate, by Senators who denied that they were engaged in filibustering, there would be in the neighborhood of 100 filibusters in the Senate.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct. The filibusters have represented every area of the United States, and every type of thought, including that of those who usually style themselves as liberals.

Mr. ERVIN. The first time I ever learned anything about filibusters was when I was 12 years of age. I was brought to the Senate gallery by my father. The elder Bob La Follette, of Wisconsin, was conducting a filibuster. He was one of the greatest liberals the country ever had, in the good, old-fashioned sense of the term "liberal." That was back in the days when liberals did not seek to make everyone conform to their ideas. He was a true liberal. He was not illiberal.

Mr. TALMADGE. His idea was to protect the people from the Government, instead of making the people the creatures of government.

Mr. ERVIN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator from North Carolina said a moment ago.

Mr. ERVIN. I said that the first time I ever heard anything about filibusters was when I was 12 years of age. I was brought to the Senate gallery by my father. I heard my first filibuster. It was being conducted by the elder Senator Robert M. La Follette, one of the greatest true liberals ever to grace the North American continent.

I ask the Senator if the RECORD does not show that there have been only seven filibusters against so-called civil rights bills?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if the RECORD does not show that four of those filibusters occurred in the following years: 1942, 1944, 1946, and 1947?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. They were filibusters against a proposal to abolish, by Federal statute, laws of States imposing poll taxes as a prerequisite to registration and voting.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask if each of those four filibusters was not conducted within a period of 11 years after the Supreme Court of the United States had handed down the decision—still in effect—in the case of Breedlove against Suttles, reported in 302 U.S. 267, under which decision each of the four bills which were filibustered against would have been held to be unconstitutional if they had been enacted into law?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. That leaves three filibusters, besides filibusters against the unconstitutional proposal relating to civil rights. Is not that correct?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct. As the Senator will recall, during the War Between the States a so-called filibuster saved the right of habeas corpus itself, which is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ERVIN. That was at a time when southerners were not in the Senate.

Mr. TALMADGE. That is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator from Georgia if history does not show that two other filibusters were conducted against civil rights bills, one being conducted in 1922 and another in 1938, against so-called antilynching laws.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Those filibusters were conducted against antilynching laws at a time when lynching had become probably the most infrequently committed crime in the United States.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator if the other filibuster against so-called civil rights bills was not conducted against the FEPC bill, which proposed, in effect, to say to the people that those who put up their hard-earned money to conduct a business should not have the right to determine for themselves whom they should hire, promote, or discharge, but that that power should be exercised by some politician who did not know anything whatever about the business which was being conducted.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely right.

Mr. ERVIN. As I said before, the fact is that the mountains have labored and have brought forth two mice. The first is that 22 southern Senators can work their will on the other 76 Members of the Senate; the other is that filibusters have been conducted against civil rights bills almost exclusively.

Mr. TALMADGE. During the 85th Congress a civil rights bill was passed without resort to cloture, although most of the southern Senators were opposed to the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Is it not true that the history of the use of the filibuster in the Senate shows that the right to filibuster has been exercised in 80 percent of the cases by Senators who come from above the Mason-Dixon line, and that in the great majority of that 80 percent the filibusters were conducted by Senators who are liberals and who insisted on the right of having a reasonable amount of debate guaranteed to them as the only method by which minorities, especially liberal minorities, could exercise their functions as U.S. Senators?

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend from Georgia. Speaking only for myself, I should like to associate myself with the comment just made by the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina. I too agree that civil rights legislation is not the only important matter in connection with the changing of rule XXII. To my mind there are other issues which require an amendment of that rule. They involve such measures as mutual security, foreign policy, trade policy, urban renewal, slum clearance, highway programs—all those programs for which the senior Senator from Pennsylvania and various other members of the party to which the Senator from Georgia and I are proud to belong are eager to see written on the statute books by the 86th Congress.

The senior Senator from North Carolina is quite right when he says that this issue should not be, and must not be, an issue of civil rights. The issue is whether the Senate will modernize its procedures so as to meet the challenge of the modern world. I thank my friend from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. I will say to my good friend from Pennsylvania that bills relating to every subject he has enumerated were passed by the last several Congresses without any effort on the part of anyone to filibuster against any of them.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure that we will not agree on this point—and I do not wish to have the last word in the discussion, because the Senator from Georgia has the floor—but to my way of thinking the threat of the filibuster has hung over the passage of legislation in all the categories of legislation to which he has referred, much of which was not passed and much of which when passed was passed in forms, to my way of thinking at least, not so effective as might otherwise have been, had majority rule prevailed.

Mr. TALMADGE. I recall no attempt on the part of any Member of the Senate in the past 2 years, since I have been a Member of the Senate, to filibuster or attempt to filibuster in any way against any piece of legislation enumerated by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania. The legislation might not have been passed in the form I had desired or that the Senator from Pennsylvania had desired, but in the final analysis it was passed by the Senate in accordance with the desires of the majority of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. In all candor I would have to agree with my friend from Georgia that one cannot put his finger on a specific piece of legislation passed since he and I have been Members of the Senate when an active, open filibuster prevented a bill from being passed. The point is that the threat of the filibuster is constantly present in the mind of every Member of every committee as legislation is being considered, and in my humble judgment—and I am sure the Senator from Georgia and I will not agree on this point—it is that threat which is making it difficult for the Senate to modernize its procedures.

Mr. TALMADGE. I am sorry to have to disagree with the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have heard of no intimation of any threat of any filibuster on the part of any Member of the Senate with respect to any piece of legislation which the Senator from Pennsylvania has enumerated.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator from Georgia agree with me that this is what the Senator from Pennsylvania, in substance, has said? "While I do not have any evidence to prove my case, I am satisfied that my case exists."

Mr. TALMADGE. I believe that might be a correct summary of the allegation which the Senator from Pennsylvania has made.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TALMADGE. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure that since the Senator from North Carolina has brought my name into the discussion, the Senator from Georgia will yield briefly to me once more.

Mr. TALMADGE. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to say to my good friend from North Carolina that every now and then even in the Senate we must sometimes indulge in the practice of amateur psychiatry.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SPARKMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield briefly to me so that I may ask that a motion I intend to make may be read at the desk?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done without my losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I submit a notice of motion to amend a rule of the Senate. A copy of it is at the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the notice of motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND THE RULES

In accordance with the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention hereafter to submit a resolution proposing to amend rule XIX, relating to debate, by inserting after paragraph No. 1 of the said rule the new paragraph, No. 2, as follows:

"2. At any time during the consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter pending before the Senate, it shall be in order to offer a motion that the Senate proceed with the consideration of amendments, which motion shall be privileged and decided with not more than 1 hour of debate, to be equally divided between opponents and proponents.

"If such a motion shall be determined in the affirmative, any amendment thereafter proposed, together with debate thereon, and all debate under the order for pending business shall be required to be germane to the subject matter before the Senate. All questions of relevancy under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be decided without debate.

"Change the numbers of the succeeding paragraphs of the rule.

"The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the consideration and germaneness of amendments, together with debate thereon, to a matter pending before the Senate."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I thank the Senator from Alabama for his courtesy.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield briefly to me?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania for the purpose of offering an amendment, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], and myself, I send to the desk an amendment to the motion submitted by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and I ask that the amendment may be printed and placed on the desk of all Senators tomorrow and lie on the table. I also ask unanimous consent that the text of the amendment may appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point in the proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the amendment will be received, and printed, and will lie on the table; and without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment submitted by Mr. CLARK, for himself and other Senators is as follows:

Resolved, That, in accordance with article 1, sec. 5 of the Constitution which declares that "each House may determine the Rules of its proceedings" this body proceed now to the immediate consideration of the adoption of Rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

SEC. 2. The Standing Rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress shall be the same as the Standing Rules, other than rule XXII, of the Senate of the 85th Congress.

SEC. 3. Consideration of the form of rule XXII for the Senate of the 86th Congress shall be the next order of business of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the known evidence is overwhelming that the Senate is a continuing body. For one thing, according to the Constitution, custom and judicial precedent, the Senate of today is the Senate that was set up by the Constitution.

This concept of a continuing Senate is borne out by the writings of many authoritative authors, including Hamilton, Madison, and Jay in the Federalist papers. In many of the Federalist papers, we see a marked feeling on the part of those persuasive writers that the Senate should be organized as a stabilizing factor to counterbalance the ever-changing lower House, which re-formed completely every 2 years; that the upper House would continue to exist from session to session despite the changes in the House of Representatives.

The following quotations from the Federalist papers have especial importance in this regard:

Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the appropriation or disappropriation of that body (the Senate) which, from the greater permanency of its own composition (as compared with the Office of the Presidency), will in all probability be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government (No. 77, pp. 476–477).

By leaving a considerable residue of the old ones (Senators) in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information, will be preserved (No. 76, p. 402).

According to most of the recognized authorities in the field of government, there is little doubt that the Senate of the United States is a continuing body. Former Senator Henry Cabot Lodge wrote in his "Senate of the United States," page 11, that—

The Senate had never required reorganization since the beginning of the Government.

According to William F. Willoughby, former Director of the Institute for Government Research:

It [the Senate] * * * meets fully organized and provided with rules determining its method of procedure.

Willoughby, "Principles of Legislative Organization Administration," page 243:

[It] * * * is a continuing body.

Haynes, "Senate of the United States," page 341.

Prof. Edward S. Corwin, editor of the annotated volume of the Constitution published by the Library of Congress, says:

The Senate is a continuing body. * * * Hence its rules remain in force from Congress to Congress except as they are changed from time to time, whereas those of the House are readopted at the outset of each new Congress.

Mr. President, earlier today, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] quoted from a very valuable book which is a part of the material in every Senator's desk and was made available to Senators last year. It is entitled "Senate Procedure" and was written by our Parliamentarians, Mr. Charles L. Watkins and Mr. Floyd M. Riddick. Reference is made to this question in that book. The Senator from North Carolina did not quote one statement, however, which I think should be quoted in addition to what he said. On page 545, this statement is made by our two eminent authorities:

On two occasions in recent years, at the beginning of the last two Congresses, motions to proceed to the consideration of the adoption of new rules were tabled and the Senate proceeded under the old rules which has been the practice and custom of the entire history of the Senate.

I think it is rather significant that our Parliamentarians saw fit to include that statement in their book, "Senate Procedure," which has been placed in the hands of every Senator to assist him in his duties in the Senate.

Although judicial authority for the proposition that the Senate is a continuing body is rare, there is an important Supreme Court case which has pronounced directly on this question. In McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U.S. 135 (1926)), the Court held that the Senate is a continuing body and made the following pertinent observation:

(The Senate) is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

The highest courts of two States recognize the rule of decision in the McGrain case: Robertson v. State ((Indiana, 1887), 79 N.E. 582), and Swing v. Riley ((California, 1939), 90 p. 2d 313).

It is true that article I, section 5 of the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." No legislative assembly can function without the power to organize its proceedings according to its lights.

I may say that that statement applies not only to any legislative body; it applies to any organization or any group of persons who form themselves into an organization. We all know that usually the first thing which is done is to establish rules; or if the organization does not write its own rules, it adopts an existing system of rules of order. Some times the organization adopts what is known as a constitution and bylaws. It is quite significant, I think, that in every instance one of the rules adopted is a rule setting forth the procedure by which the rules may be amended.

I think there is some analogy in the Constitution of the United States, which, after all, establishes the rules under which the Federal Government shall operate. It is quite significant that one of the articles in the Constitution was utilized for the purpose of stating how those rules might be amended. It may be worthy of note that two ways were named; and in neither way was it to be done by a simple majority. More than a simple majority is required for each House of Congress to propose to the States a constitutional amendment. More than a simple majority is required for the States to ratify such a proposal. Or if the States want to initiate action to amend the Constitution, more than a simple majority of States is required to do so.

There is nothing unusual about that kind of procedure, either in the Constitution of the United States, under which the Federal Government operates, or in the rules of any other legislative body, organization, or group who form themselves into an organization for the purpose of carrying on regular business. But the United States Senate is not an ordinary legislative body, as has been pointed out. It must function according to the design of its organization. This design, as has been mentioned, envisaged the Senate as a body that was to have continuity, that would "outlive" the lower House and furnish stability as well as deliberation to the national legislature. Therefore, the rules that have been adopted by the Senate are passed along to succeeding Senates, and they, of course, can be altered only in conformity with the procedures which have been incorporated in those rules for the purpose.

Thus, those who support rule XXII, or any other rule of the Senate, do not contend that the Senate lacks power to choose its own rules, but that it must continue to fulfill the role laid out for it over a period of a century and a half; it must preserve its link with previous Senates by adhering to custom, practice, and constitutional dictates.

The customs and practices of the Senate also bear out the idea of a continuing body. The Senate does not formally adopt new rules at the beginning of a new Congress. It proceeds to business without the necessity of doing so—unlike the House, which must formally adopt a new set of rules—for the reason that it is not really a different entity than its predecessor. Therefore, it operates under the same rules. To assert that the Senate has actually been tacitly readopting previous rules by acquiescence, as do opponents of rule XXII, is to ignore the actual practice of past Senates or to attempt to explain it away with legal fictions.

In addition to these customs, the rules of the Senate and the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 appear to be predicated upon the basic concept that the Senate is a continuing body. According to Senate rule 25(2) each standing committee shall continue to have the power to act until their successors are appointed. Section 134 of the Reorganization Act provides that each standing committee of the Senate is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate as it deems advisable. In accordance with its well-established customs, the Senate continues in operation its various committees and officers without regard to the expiration of a particular Congress.

The executive activities of the Senate further illustrate its nature as a continuing body: Treaties submitted by the President do not have to be resubmitted at the next term of Congress—they remain the Senate's business; executive activities may be conducted, when necessary, at special sessions called by the President, according to the Constitution article II, section 3; were the Senate not designed as a continuing body, we should hardly find the Founding Fathers drafting such a provision.

These long-continued, contemporaneous and practical precedents, necessarily predicated upon the concept of the Senate as a continuing body, must be given great weight. A congressional instruction of the Constitution which has been followed since the founding of the Federal Government is entitled to great respect.

During the debate in the Senate on the question of whether to censure the late Senator McCarthy, attention was focused on the report of the committee headed by Senator Watkins. In this report was incorporated the idea that the Senate was a continuing body. It was necessary to resolve the question before the vote could be taken due to parliamentary technicalities. In voting in favor of the censure, the Senators so voting were also placing their approval on the continuing body doctrine.

If the Senate were to decide that it must adopt new rules at the outset of a new term, it might well be that parliamentary chaos would result. Were entirely new rules to be adopted, it would be exceedingly difficult to determine under which set of rules of the many that exist the Senate would proceed. Few, if any, Senators have had a voice in the drawing up of the various sets of precedents and rules that are to be chosen from. As each new rule would be debatable, an intolerable length of time might well elapse before the Senate could organize itself.

Often one hears it asserted by those opposed to rule XXII that, somehow, the notion of majority rule is inherent in the democratic system. Such is not the case. The Senate itself was expressly designed for the purpose of slowing down the process of lawmaking so that calm and due deliberation might be given to measures rushed through the lower House, even though a majority there might be in favor of them.

Majority rule is valid only as opposed to minority rule. Outside of that equation, it does not characterize the democratic way of life as it exists in this country.

Amendments to the Constitution, approval of treaties, impeachment trials and overriding the Presidential vetoes are examples of cases wherein more than a simple majority is required.

The Senate is sometimes compared with the upper house in several State legislatures, which do not regard themselves as continuing bodies and which have rather liberal cloture rules. This is very misleading. The Senate can in no really valid way be compared with any other legislative body in the country.

It is unique. As pointed out above, it is the embodiment of the Federal-State relationship upon which the Union was founded; its Members represent not small segments of their States, arbitrarily chosen, but the whole State. In a very real sense they come to the National Government as ambassadors from their respective States, and not as representatives of an inferior and subservient entity.

A State legislature is an entirely different matter. It was not created under the special conditions that attended the birth of the Republic. It has its own constitution and may order the procedure in its own Legislature as it sees fit. It represents only the people of that particular State.

The Constitution offers further proof that the framers of that document thought it desirable that provision be made for dilatory tactics, so that the majority of the moment might not override a minority. Article I, section 5, provides that, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, the years and nays of any vote must be entered on the Journal.

The use of dilatory tactics, such as the filibuster, has not by any means wrought the damage claimed by the opponents of rule XXII. No really meritorious bill, sincerely desired by a majority, has ever been defeated permanently by a filibuster. On the other hand, many unwise measures have been defeated by this method. It should be noted that the Senate, without majority cloture, passes a larger amount of bills introduced in that body than does the House of Representatives, which has a strict limitation of debate.

Of course, Mr. President, those who would force the Senate to adopt rules at the beginning of each Congress, usually have in mind the modification or change of rule XXII, the rule that permits free and extended debate. Thus the debate going on now really relates to this proposed change.

In considering the vital question of changing Senate Rule 22, one should also know and understand the nature and purpose of the Senate.

The upper House of the National Legislature is not just another assembly of lawmakers. It is a very special organization and this must be kept in mind whenever the expediencies of the moment seem to necessitate some changes in its mode of operating.

The kind of body that the Senate is will readily be understood on examination of the basis upon which the Republic was founded and the Constitution adopted. In order to induce the several States to cede a portion of their sovereignty to the National Government, it was necessary to insure to the States that the portion of sovereignty not given up would be protected, and that all States, regardless of their size and population, would have an equal voice in the Senate. In order to accomplish these purposes, the Senate was created, composed of two Members from each State, at first chosen by the State legislatures. The Senate was originally envisioned as an assemblage of ambassadors from the States, in part at least, wherein could be heard the voices of those representing the States as States.

The Members of the House of Representatives speak as representatives of special districts within their States and for the interests of their own particular localities. But when a United States Senator stands up to speak in the Senate, he speaks not for an arbitrarily marked-off district within his State, but for the whole State and all its people. Whenever he addresses the Senate, one is necessarily reminded of that special relationship existing between the Federal Government and the States, created by the Constitution when it bestowed certain enumerated powers upon the National Government and reserved the rest to the States.

This necessary delineation of power was clearly and specifically spelled out in the 10th amendment.

Let me read this amendment. Without it the Constitution would never have been ratified by several of the Thirteen Original Colonies, nor accepted by many within those Colonies that had ratified it prior to the amendment's adoption.

It is an amendment that each of us should read often and follow implicitly.

It says:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The Senate is the embodiment and preserver of this relationship between the State government and the National Government. Diminish it to the level of the ordinary body of elected representatives and the federation of States which makes up the Union will turn into another power state, with a strong and dominant central government and 49 provinces.

Since the Senate is the only forum in which can be heard the voice of one chosen by the people of a State to represent them, it is essential that the right of such a one to be heard should not be trammeled, confined, and ultimately choked off at the whim of a group which might well be moved by special interests.

Rule XXII may well be viewed as a device for the protection of the minority against the dictation of the majority of the moment. This rule, insuring the right of reasonably unhampered debate, exists from Congress to Congress—as will be shown later—and assures to all the right to be heard. It would not be abolished to fit what some conceive to be the interests of the moment. It is a wise rule embodying a fundamental principle adhered to by the Senate since the formation of the Republic. It protects not only what may be the minority of today, but also what may well become the minority of tomorrow. As the noted columnist, William White, pointed out a few days ago:

The ultimate victims of halting Senate debate by simple majority would be any or every minority and any or every minority interest or issue, given a favorable atmosphere for the majority.

In this regard, Mr. President, I have had letters from many parts of our Nation outside the South expressing grave concern over both the argument that the Senate is not a continuing body and the proposal to change the Senate rule of free and extended debate.

A typical letter is one from Wisconsin. Let me read it to the Senate:

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: If we are to believe what we read in the papers (and I guess most of us do), it is most likely the first session of the new Congress will open with a fight which I believe is of great importance to us all. The subject of which I am sure you are well aware is the contemplated move to bring about a changing of the Senate rules. This disturbs me very much.

It is not at all that I believe in the status quo—far be that from true. You no doubt are more familiar with the motives behind this plan than I am. It is my belief the motive is precisely one which the current rule on filibusters was devised to make secure. This is the protection of minority groups. The recent election to the contrary, I am sure it would be provable that a vast majority of the people in this country, if they were brought to understand the full meaning of the rule, would not vote for any individual on the basis of supporting a change.

The proponents of this rule change are endeavoring to alter the basic foundation of our democratic form of government under which you were given by your constituents so great a responsibility. It seems to me the stability of our whole Federal system relies heavily on the Senate maintaining itself as a continuing body. There have been wide swings in political thought many times during our history. A relatively true course has been maintained, primarily because of the steadying influence of the Senate. At this precarious time in world history, to jeopardize the one Government which stands above all others by such an expeditious move as has been proposed by some, seems to me traitorous in nature.

I am making this appeal to you to stand firm, not because the company for which I work has extensive industrial interests in your State, but because I as an ordinary citizen with a family have a deep concern that I discharge my responsibility to them. This is the least I can do.

Sincerely,

Rule XXII also protects the Senate against being turned into a body dominated by the machine rule of a few "bosses," who could then direct the proceedings of the Senate through the party-caucus method, dispensing favors and patronage to the faithful Members.

The processes of the U.S. Senate have purposely been made slower and more deliberate than the House of Representatives in order that proposed legislation can be thoroughly examined and debated and so that the full force of informed public opinion can be brought to bear upon the measures being considered by Congress.

Inherent in the idea of popular representative government is the belief that the elected representatives of the people should remain responsive to the well-informed and enlightened will of the people. It is becoming increasingly difficult to keep the representatives of the people in real touch with those who chose them, but to a very real extent this is done in the case of the Senate. In that body, both by tradition and according to the fundamental concepts of the Constitution, a great measure of free debate and deliberation exists. This enables the Members of the Senate to slow down the impetus given to proposed legislation by the headlong procedures of the House, and hold new measures, so to speak, up before the public gaze.

The Senate sits in a sort of appellate capacity with respect to proposed laws. It is its duty to go carefully over them, and this can hardly be done without ample freedom of debate. Debate is limited in the House of Representatives. This may be quite fitting for a body with such a broad and popular basis of membership as the House of Representatives, but it hardly suits the Senate. It is essential that one place be left for thorough-going debate, and this is only possible in the Senate.

Another important aspect of the Senate's function is its force as a check upon the executive branch of the Government. For this purpose it is imperative that the Senate be permitted complete freedom to express itself; otherwise, it would fall submissive on many occasions to presidential and party autocracy, thus vitiating the idea of the separation of powers so essential to our system of Government.

No doubt many Senators, if not all, have read the most excellent statement in letter form made by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] about a month or so ago on the question of rule change.

It is well to repeat his statement here. He said:

I have been advised that another effort will be made to change rule XXII when the 86th Congress convenes.

After 18 years experience in the U.S. Senate, I am unalterably opposed to limiting debate in the Senate, the one place left in this world for free and untrampled discussion. My views upon this have been stated so often on the Senate floor that it is not necessary for me to fully restate them here.

Don't you think it mighty strange when oldtimers like Bob La Follette and Charles McNary and men of their fine type totally rejected the limitation of debate that some Senators on the pretext of passing some civil rights bill, are going to give those opposed to liberal legislation the chance to wreck the passage of liberal bills. As Senator McNary so well stated, "A good bill never has been killed by a filibuster, but many a bad bill has been prevented from becoming a law by a few fighting liberals."

To go back even further into the history of unlimited debate in the Senate, I quote Senator Harris, of Tennessee, who, in 1891, states as follows: "So I assert with absolute confidence that from the 26th day of March 1806, there has been no proposition to limit general debate in the Senate that has not been rebuked as an attack upon free speech and upon the rights of the States and the people and dangerous to well-considered legislation as well as to civil liberty. They have been, as they ought to have been, invariably defeated."

It is interesting to note from Senator Harris' quotation that unlimited debate is most necessary to protect our civil liberty, whereas today the proponents of the change of rule XXII would destroy that protection to civil liberties just because they feel that a civil rights bill cannot pass under existing rule XXII.

I would like to reiterate what I said on the Senate floor on March 11, 1949, in discussing rule XXII when I stated, "I wish to say that during the 8 years I have been here, I have voted for every bill, without exception, calling for the establishment of civil rights in this country. So, today, I wish to make it very plain that I vote to override the decision of the Vice President, I am still a firm, fighting friend of civil rights—just as strong a friend of civil rights as I ever was: and if the Democrats will begin tomorrow or Monday with a really serious effort to carry out Mr. Truman's civil rights program, I assure my friend the distinguished majority leader [Mr. Lucas] that he will find me voting with him every single time. I hope the Democratic Party will do that. I hope they begin on it right away, and never quit until they secure the enactment of that civil rights program. I think they will receive a great deal of support from Senators on this side of the aisle."

I believe that we, the members of the Senate can best understand the great need to have complete debate on the Senate floor if we would study the speeches of our predecessors in office. For example, read the speech of Senator La Follette of March 8, 1917, beginning on page 40 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which he also quotes from Senator George Gray (Delaware); Senator John Coit Spooner (Wisconsin); Senator Henry Moore Teller (Colorado) who spoke on this subject on the 22d of January 1891. Speeches by other distinguished Senators, can be found in volume 116 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 51st Congress, 2d session, beginning on page 1670 and running through pages 1740, where, in 1841, many distinguished Senators from all sections of the country expressed the great need for unlimited debate.

In closing, I regret to see such fine men as the proponents for a change of Senate rule XXII deceiving themselves in doing something, which if they succeed, I believe they will live to regret.

Critics of so-called filibusters in the U.S. Senate say that extended debate is a violation of majority rule.

Actually the present Senate rule does not provide an opportunity to set up an absolute barrier against action. The rule is that a vote of two-thirds of the full membership of the Senate is necessary to shut off debate. But two-thirds can do so.

The idea is that it should be hard to shut off debate. That is a good idea. There are other provisions in our governmental structure which make it hard to take certain action, such as amending the Constitution.

Protection of the individual and of minorities is an underlying purpose in certain basic provisions of the Constitution. Making such provisions is essential to a genuinely free system.

The Senate rule as to shutting off debate does make it harder at times for a majority to act. But it also can protect a minority.

Broad freedom of discussion, like other freedoms, does involve risks. But they are risks essential to true liberty.

Perhaps it would be helpful to review briefly how the present Senate rule XXII came into being.

The present Senate rule XXII took its form in February 1949, during the 1st session of the 81st Congress, and reads as follows:

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or rule VI or any other rule of the Senate, except subsection 3 of rule XXII, at any time a motion signed by 16 Senators to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but 1, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question: Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?

2. And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by two-thirds of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate.

3. The provisions of the last paragraph of rule VIII (prohibiting debate on motions made before 2 o'clock and of subsection 2 of this rule) shall not apply to any motion to proceed to the consideration of any motion, resolution, or proposal to change any of the Standing Rules of the Senate.

When the first Senate convened in 1789, a rule was adopted providing that, when a question was before the Senate, no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit, or to adjourn. In 1806 the rules were modified and reference to the previous question was omitted; no other cloture provisions were made.

In 1807, debate on an amendment at the third reading of a bill was forbidden and from this time until 1846 there were no further limitations on debate in the Senate. In that year a species of cloture came in known as the unanimous-consent agreement, a device for limiting debate and expediting the passage of legislation. During the Civil War debate in secret session on matters relating to the war was limited by rule to 5 minutes by any Member and was confined to the subject.

In 1868 the Senate adopted a rule providing that motions to take up or proceed to the consideration of any question should be determined without debate.

In 1870 the Senate adopted the Anthony rule limiting debate on the call of the calendar to one 5-minute speech per Senator on any question. The Anthony rule was made a standing rule in 1880—rule VIII. During the 1870's Senate debate on appropriations bills was limited by the 5-minute rule.

In 1881 the Senate agreed, for the remainder of the session, to limit to 15 minutes debate on a motion to consider a bill or resolution, no Senator to speak more than once, or for longer than 5 minutes.

In 1884 the Senate amended its rules, so as to provide that all motions, made before 2 o'clock, to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate—rule VIII. In the same year the Senate amended its 10th rule, so as to provide that all motions to change the order of precedence on special orders, or to proceed to the consideration of other business, should be decided without debate. Also in that year the Senate provided by rule that motions to lay before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives should be determined without debate—rule VII.

In 1908 it was decided that Senators could, by enforcement of the rules, be restrained from speaking on the same subject more than twice in the same legislative day.

The next important change in the Senate rules came in March 1917, when Senator Walsh's amendment of rule XXII was adopted. This permitted debate to be brought to a close by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, assuming a quorum. In February 1949,during an attempt further to liberalize this rule, the requirement was added, by the Wherry-Hayden amendment, that the two-thirds vote must be made up out of the Senate as constitutionally organized, not just those present. Since then, a vote of 64 Senators has been required for debate to be ended. With the coming of 2 Senators from Alaska the number now required is 66.

The question before us now is basic: Is the Senate a continuing body? All the decisions, precedents, and practices over the years have been to the effect that the Senate is a continuing body.

Believing that, I shall vote against the Anderson motion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Rule 22," which was published yesterday in the Washington Evening Star.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RULE XXII

The most important issue which will have to be faced at the outset of the 86th Congress, opening today, is concerned with the fate of something known as Senate rule XXII—the so-called filibuster rule.

At stake are two sections of this rule. One, on the theory that the Senate is a continuing body, provides that its rules carry over from one Congress to the next, and that debate on a proposal to change the rules cannot be limited. The other section provides that debate on any proposal except a rules change can be limited only if two-thirds of all the members vote for such action.

Thus, at the outset, the liberal Senators are faced with two problems. Unless there is some kind of compromise, they must wear out a filibuster against a proposal to change Rule 22, or they must find some hitherto undiscovered parliamentary device for getting around it. Then, assuming that the unlimited debate phase of the rule is changed, they must persuade the Senate to adopt a modified cloture, or debate limitation, rule.

As a practical matter, the choice probably will come down to a decision between the positions taken by Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON and Senator PAUL DOUGLAS of Illinois. Senator JOHNSON favors a change by which cloture could be invoked by two-thirds of the Senators actually present and voting. The Douglas proposal, in the last analysis, would permit cloture by a simple majority vote. As between the two, we think Senator JOHNSON'S plan is greatly to be preferred.

The Senators who support the Douglas plan say that they are doing so in the interests of securing "civil rights." No doubt they are sincere. But there are at least two good reasons for looking with grave misgiving on their approach.

One is that this "majority rule" formula is a two-edged sword. Today it may cut through procedural obstructions to what a "liberal" majority thinks of as desirable civil rights laws—laws designed to improve the lot of minority groups. But rule by a majority of one can be, and often has been, an instrument of oppression. Furthermore, the political coloration of majorities is subject to change. If in the future the reactionaries should get control of the Senate, we suspect that the "liberal" Senators, and the minority population groups, would take a very dim view of simple majority rule.

The second and perhaps more important reason has to do with the nature of the immediate objectives of the rule changers. They believe and they probably are right that, given simple majority rule, they can pass much tougher legislation directed against resistance in the South to integration and other civil rights measures. For our part, we doubt that such tough legislation would be wise or desirable. It is one thing to pass tough laws which may have a vote-getting appeal outside the South. It is something else to enforce those laws without violent upheavals which, in the long run, could do much harm to the legitimate objectives of a civil rights program.

It may be undemocratic, un-American, or what have you, to argue, in today's circumstances, against "majority rule." Nevertheless we hope that the Senate will not let itself be stampeded or pressured into accepting a simple majority limitation on debate—a change which could plague this country for a long time to come.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at the beginning of this speech I wish to call attention to rule XIX, and then I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Paragraph 1 of rule XIX reads as follows:

1. When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer, and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

My parliamentary inquiry is as follows: Am I correct in my assumption that this is my first speech on the issue now before the Senate, under rule XIX?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGEE in the chair). The pending question is the proposal of the Senator from New Mexico; and this is the first speech of the Senator from Oregon on that proposal.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask for the ruling because in the very introduction of this speech I wish to make clear the purposes of the speech; and it has more than one purpose.

The first purpose is to speak to this RECORD in regard to the overall subject of modifying the rules of the Senate so that rule by the minority—now permitted under rule XXII of the Senate—will come to an end.

As I have said to my liberal friends in the Senate, in a series of conferences in recent days, I do not think this issue is as separable as the procedures attempted thus far in the debate in the Senate this year would seem to indicate. In those conferences with liberal Senators, I have taken the position, that first in this debate we ought to make an overall record, particularly for the benefit of the new Members of the Senate and for the benefit of the people of the country, as to the pros and cons on the compilation of issues that are involved. In those conferences with my liberal friends in the Senate, it has been my position that we should not be voting on the Anderson motion or the Johnson resolution or the proposal of the Senators from Illinois, Minnesota, New Jersey, and New York until there has first been presented for this RECORD a body of discussion and argument on the many facets of the overall subject. Mr. President, it is important that I make that statement at least for the information of my colleagues in the Senate, so they will better understand the procedure which I am following tonight in the Senate.

Mr. President, on yesterday I sought to participate in discussing this overall issue. I was on my feet several times for that purpose. In fact, I was on my feet, seeking the floor in my own right, when the majority leader moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. President, the comment I now make is not in any way meant as a personal reflection on the majority leader or on any other Member of the Senate. It is a very impersonal comment; but it goes to the same basic, procedural safeguards in the Senate accruing to the parliamentary rights of all Senators that, so long as I sit in the Senate, I am going to seek to protect; and it matters not to me who may be the majority leader at any time or what party he may represent.

Mr. President, I am so dedicated to the proposition that the procedural rights of all Members of this body, including the rights of minority Members, must be protected at all times, that I have no intention of following any majority leader at any time on any proposal which in my judgment transgresses upon those rights.

So, Mr. President, when, on yesterday, while the majority leader was holding the floor in his own right after having made his speech on the issue pending before the Senate, we were confronted with a motion that the Senate adjourn, I immediately asked for a yea-and-nay vote, because I thought it important to make a record vote on that matter.

Now, there is no question about the parliamentary right of the majority leader to make his motion to adjourn. But making the motion to adjourn did not, Mr. President, protect what I always thought was the proposal of those holding to the point of view of the majority leader on the merits of the general legislative issue before the Senate—that they believed in full debate in the Senate.

And so I took the position, Mr. President, that at least the motion to adjourn should not have been made until the majority leader had yielded the floor and given an opportunity to other Senators to speak in their own right on the merits of the issue. What it involved in effect, Mr. President, was an imposition of cloture upon Members of the Senate who wanted to proceed yesterday to discuss the issue on its merits.

Oh, I know it can be said that a majority of the Senate voted to adjourn. Of course, they did. But there is a lot of difference between what a paper record will show and what those of us who have been in the Senate for many years know happens to be the real desire of many Members of the Senate.

And I tell you, Mr. President, it is my opinion, based upon what many Members of the Senate said to me yesterday and again today, that what the vote really represented, more than anything else, was whether or not we were going to support the leadership of the majority leader on a procedural matter on that date—not that individuals thought on the merits we ought to shut off debate by this form of cloture.

It always pains me when I cannot support my majority leader on a procedural matter. But, Mr. President, I shall always oppose the kind of procedure that the majority leader followed yesterday, because I believe after one Senator has had his say on the merits of an issue, those on the other side of that issue ought to have an opportunity, immediately thereafter, to present their case on the merits.

This is a great educational body. What is said in this body, Mr. President, has a great effect on American public opinions. The American people were entitled yesterday to our answers to the position taken by the majority leader; but the exercise of his great prestige and influence in the Senate as majority leader, by a motion to adjourn, had the effect of cutting us off from that opportunity of full debate. I made very clear to the majority leader I did not like it, as did some others in the Senate yesterday.

The procedure followed today, Mr. President, was also procedure that I do not intend to support, so long as I am in the Senate.

There was a series of conferences this morning by some Senators, and it was reported that out of those conferences came an understanding by those in attendance at the conferences that a motion to lay on the table would be made by the majority leader some time this afternoon, and voted on some time between 4 and 6 p.m.—thus, it was said, making it possible for Members of the Senate who have social engagements tonight to arrange to accommodate themselves to those engagements.

Well, as I have already explained on the floor of the Senate today, anybody who entered into that understanding did not enter into it on my behalf or on behalf of other Senators who have come to me and made clear to me that they share exactly the position I have taken on this procedural matter.

So I made clear that if the majority leader made his motion to lay on the table, he certainly was within his parliamentary rights. There was not anything I could do to stop him, if he got the floor, as I was sure he would get the floor, because as we all know, it is the standard practice, and rightly so, that when the majority leader seeks recognition, he is recognized. After all, we could not conduct the work of the Senate, in my judgment, unless those privileges and courtesies were granted to the majority leader.

But I also made clear that if he made the motion to lay on the table, he would, in effect, be applying a form of cloture against members of the Senate who wished to discuss this matter, and its many ramifications, on its merits, before any vote was taken on any phase of the subject matter. That was a decision for him to make; but I stated I would always exercise my parliamentary rights under the rules of the Senate, in accordance with what my best judgment dictated.

That is no new position for liberals. Mr. President, for decades liberals in the Senate of the United States have had to protect their minority rights by exercising their rights under the rules of the Senate. I remember that after the first speech I made in the Senate in 1945, young Bob La Follette, a distinguished Senator from Wisconsin at that time, came over and sat down along side of me after I had finished. He said to me, "I have a bit of advice to give to you. Make a study of the rules of the Senate and, as a liberal, be ready to exercise your prerogatives under those rules, when movements are on in the Senate to use the rules for the purpose of steamrolling tactics or to defeat the type of legislation that the public interest calls for, and for which liberals are renowned to stand."

I have followed that advice through 14 years in the Senate, and I am following it tonight, because in my judgment it would be unfair to permit this issue to go to a vote tonight. At least the new Members of the Senate should have an opportunity to read the RECORD of today's proceedings, because in my opinion a very important record has been made today by previous speakers. I think before new Members of this body are called upon to make their records on this issue, with which they are going to have to live throughout their political lives in the future, they should at least have time to do their book work. The new Members should have an opportunity to at least read the pros and cons on this great issue as presented today in this historic debate.

Mr. President, every new Member of the Senate is going to discover, as those of us who have been here for some time have already discovered, that many people in this country are familiar with the importance of this issue and the democratic process in passing legislation in the Senate of the United States. I have said many times, and I repeat tonight, that I think the people of the country are way ahead of the Senate of the United States on this issue. It is my opinion that the overwhelming majority of the people of this country who have taken the time to give consideration to this parliamentary problem share the point of view of those of us who think the rule should be modified so that the principle of majority vote can prevail in the Senate on the passage of legislation, which means, of course, that the principle of majority vote also would have to prevail with respect to rules for the implementation of the legislative process in the Senate of the United States.

In fairness to these new Members who in my judgment are about to be called upon to cast a vote with which they are going to have to live on their record with their constituents for years ahead. I think they should be given more time than was proposed to be allowed by the suggestion that a motion to lay on the table would be made some time between 4 o'clock and 6 o'clock this afternoon, and voted upon in that period of time.

Several colleagues who were not parties to any conference at the Vice President's desk in the Senate this morning have told me they were not bound by any understanding which was reached at that desk, and that they completely shared my point of view that, if possible, a vote on this matter today should be prevented.

I have served for a long time as somewhat of a watchdog in the Senate on such matters as this, so I agreed to follow the parliamentary course which at least had a good chance of preventing a vote from occurring tonight. I made perfectly clear to the majority leader that if I were recognized before he was recognized to make his motion to lay on the table, there would be no vote tonight. I made very clear that I did not think it right or fair to impose that type of cloture upon the Senate today; that I had always stood in the Senate for a procedure which would permit adequate time to discuss the merits of issues before a vote.

Of course, the rules provide for a motion to lay on the table, and of course the motion is nondebatable, and of course it could have been made by the majority leader at any time. But I made clear that in making the motion he would have to assume full responsibility for denying to those in the Senate who I knew wanted to discuss this matter on the merits a full opportunity to discuss it on the merits. When the majority leader understood that I was irrevocably adamant in regard to my position, being the very able leader that he is, and recognizing the importance of at least trying to reconcile conflicting points of view, he made the suggestion earlier this afternoon, that he would seek recognition at 11:30 tomorrow morning to make his motion at that time, reserving, as the RECORD will show he did reserve, the right to exercise his wise discretion in case the debates tomorrow morning on the part of others indicate that a longer period of time for discussion of the merits would be desirable.

I appreciate the position which the majority leader took, and I make these statements about it because my cards are always on the top of the table.

Therefore, the purposes of my speech tonight are at least twofold. First, my purpose is to prevent a vote from occurring tonight, until the written RECORD can be made available to the Members of the Senate for their study before they vote tomorrow; and my second purpose is to make my case on the record with respect to the merits of the overall problem which confronts the Senate.

Mr. President, in the last 2 hours, since it became known that I would exercise my parliamentary right under the rules to prevent a vote tonight, I have had many conversations with my colleagues. Some of them have said that they would be delighted to stay if I wished them to stay. In each instance I told them, "You can read, and I see no reason why you should stay if you have another engagement."

My views have been stated over 14 years, from time to time, in the RECORD. They are familiar to the older Members of the Senate. I shall insert many of them in the RECORD tonight, and give a synopsis of others, but I want the RECORD to show I appreciate the courteous statements made to me by colleagues who gave me their assurance of their appreciation for the parliamentary course of action which I am taking.

It is not easy or pleasant, so far as the first purpose of my speech is concerned, to follow this course of action. It is much more pleasant to be in a situation where I am not in conflict with the leadership of my party in the Senate on any matter. But I feel that this particular matter, under the procedure which has been proposed, involves the rights of all of us, and that we would not have an adequate opportunity for full debate.

I shall never hesitate, Mr. President, no matter how impolitic or unpopular it may be, to exercise my rights in keeping with the very sound advice that Bob La Follette gave me in 1945, to protect what I consider to be some very precious safeguards under the rules of the Senate in respect to full debate.

Therefore I shall speak on the merits of the filibuster issue which I think should be discussed and made a matter of record, prior to a vote on the Anderson motion tomorrow, and then suggest a recess until 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow. But if that does not meet with the pleasure of the Senate, I shall then make, under rule XIX, my second speech of the day, and see Senators in the morning.

As to the merits of this issue, I have never been one who held to the point of view that the Senate of the United States is not a continuing body. I have always taken the position that the Senate is a continuing body. There is nothing whatsoever inconsistent between that position and the position that, at the beginning of each new Congress, the Senate has the constitutional right to adopt rules.

The whole discussion of whether the Senate is a continuing body or not is completely irrelevant to the issue which confronts us, as to whether or not the power to end debate in the Senate should be based upon a majority vote and majority rule.

There has been discussion this afternoon by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], a great and able lawyer, a distinguished former judge in North Carolina. He made reference to the case of McGrain against Daugherty, to be found in volume 273, United States Reports, at page 135. I have always said that I consider it controlling of the issue, so far as a judicial determination is concerned, as to whether or not the Senate is a continuing body. But I do not believe that we need this decision to determine that point. I think the Constitution of the United States determined it. I think it was determined when, in the Constitution, the terms of Members of the Senate and the provisions for their election were set up.

In all this discussion, it is an elemental fact that only one-third of the Senators happen to be elected every 2 years. Senatorial prerogatives, senatorial privileges, and senatorial powers of office, including investigative powers, are continued in respect to the other two-thirds—in fact, in respect to more than the other two-thirds; in respect to all those running for reelection as well.

But one does not have to rely upon such a constitutional interpretation as I have just made, in view of the fact that we do have McGrain against Daugherty. I shall read at this point a portion of McGrain against Daugherty, dealing with the question as to whether or not the Senate is a continuing body. But I ask that at the close of my speech there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the entire opinion in the case of McGrain against Daugherty, because other sections of the decisions besides those which I shall now read have a great bearing upon the entire question of the powers of the Senate. Those powers of the Senate are powers which it can exercise during the recess period after an adjournment sine die.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Without objection, the decision will be printed as requested. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn now to page 180 of volume 273, United States Reports in the case of McGrain against Daugherty:

> Another question has arisen which should be noticed. It is whether the case has become moot. The investigation was ordered and the committee appointed during the 68th Congress. That Congress expired March 4, 1925. The resolution ordering the investigation in terms limited the committee's authority to the period of the 68th Congress; but this apparently was changed by a later and amendatory resolution authorizing the committee to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable or necessary. It is said in Jefferson's Manual: "Neither House can continue any portion of itself in any parliamentary function beyond the end of the session without the consent of the other two branches. When done, it is by a bill constituting them commissioners for the particular purpose." But the context shows that the reference is to the two houses of Parliament when adjourned by prorogation or dissolution by the King. The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives, whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body, whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years, and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says: "The Senate, as a continuing body, may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress"; and, after quoting the above statement from Jefferson's Manual, he says: "The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of a Congress." So far as we are advised, the select committee having this investigation in charge has neither made a final report nor been discharged; nor has it been continued by an affirmative order. Apparently its activities have been suspended pending the decision of this case. But, be this as it may, it is certain that the committee may be continued or revived now by motion to that effect, and if continued or revived will have all its original powers. This being so, and the Senate being a continuing body, the case cannot be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense. The situation is measurably like that in Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (219 U.S. 498, 514–516), where it was held that a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission did not become moot through the expiration of the order where it was capable of repetition by the Commission and was a matter of public interest. Our judgment may yet be carried into effect and the investigation proceeded with from the point at which it apparently was interrupted by reason of the habeas corpus proceedings. In these circumstances we think a judgment should be rendered as was done in the case cited.

What has been said requires that the final order in the district court discharging the witness from custody be reversed.

Mr. President, I respectfully say that, on the basis of the Constitution itself, interpreted with great clarity by the Supreme Court in the Daugherty case, I have never been able to understand the argument of my colleagues in the Senate to the effect that the Senate is not a continuing body.

We all know that for all time within the memory of Members of the Senate, past and present, committees of the Senate have functioned during the so-called recess period, and that they have exercised subpena powers and have brought witnesses before them, who did not want to come voluntarily, by the exercise of those powers. The very exercise of those powers must be based upon the constitutional theory that the Senate is a continuing body, finally made so crystal clear in the Daugherty case, to which I have referred.

It is not pertinent or relevant to the argument to talk about the situation which exists in the House, except that as a matter of interest it ought to be pointed out—so I have been informed by the Parliamentarian, as I sought to do my book work on this subject—that the practice in the House in some specific instances is by resolution to provide for the continuation of the work of a committee of the House during a recess period or following adjournment sine die, but always under the provision that the work of that committee must be concluded prior to the taking up by a new House.

Therefore, I say, even in regard to the procedures within the House, it has been the practice by special resolution, adopted during the life of a given session of the House, to authorize the continuation of committee functions during a recess period, provided or with the understanding or under the mandate that the work of that committee and the report of that committee must be consummated before the taking up of a new session of the House of Representatives.

I mention it because in the course of the debate it has been said by some of my colleagues in the Senate that a Pandora's box would be opened if we took the position that all rules of the Senate were subject to formulation and adoption at the beginning of each new Congress.

Has anyone witnessed any Pandora's box being opened in the House over the decades in respect to this matter? It so happens that that is exactly what is done in the House. The House adopts new rules, I am advised, sometimes in a couple of minutes, usually at least in 3 minutes, by making a motion to reinstitute the rules of the last session of the House.

Therefore I have not been very much impressed by the fear arguments offered in this debate, that terrible conditions would take place in the Senate if we proceeded on the assumption that on the opening of a new Congress we could proceed to adopt new rules.

In some of our conferences with some of the leaders in the Senate who are opposed to the Anderson resolution and opposed to the Douglas-Javits-Case-Humphrey resolution, I listened to such arguments as this: "Look at the terrible position you would put the Senate in. You could not stop Senators from smoking on the floor of the Senate. You could not stop Senators from drinking on the floor of the Senate. You could not prevent them from brawling."

Mr. President, I thought I had heard a great many absurd arguments in my years of service in the Senate, but I have never heard an argument like that. I am sure we cannot imagine U.S. Senators engaging in the kind of conduct on the floor of the Senate which this scarecrow argument would imply. I just laughed at it, because that is the only way an argument like that should be treated; it is a laughable argument. Common decency, a sense of responsibility to the great trust the people of our State have placed in us, a dedication to democratic processes, and a great respect for self-government would be the checks against any such danger as that, just as they operate as checks over in the House.

It was said in one of those conferences, by one of our colleagues in the Senate presenting the leadership point of view: "You might get into the position that existed in the House some time ago when Representative Rankin took advantage of the situation to move that the Un-American Activities Committee should be made a standing committee of the House, and before the House knew what had happened, that had come to pass."

Well, Mr. President, there are a great many procedural safeguards in the House to prevent it if the will is there to exercise it. The argument is based on the false notion that a procedural mistake is irrevocable. It was made on the basis of the false assumption that something like that could happen in the Senate.

First, let me say, out of great respect for the House of Representatives, that the record of the House of Representatives in regard to this exercise of its constitutional prerogative to determine its own rules, as provided in article I, section 5, of the Constitution, has been an admirable record. It has been one which, in my judgment, supplies a complete answer to those who are trying to scare the Senate into believing that a Pandora's box would be opened up and that chaos would prevail on the floor of the Senate if we simply proceeded to exercise our rights under article I, section 5, of the Constitution.

It is an argument without substance. It is an argument which the experience of the House, over the decades, completely rebuts. It is an argument which does not take into account the inherent procedural right of any parliamentary body, such as the United States Senate, when organizing itself at the beginning of a new session of Congress, to adopt such new rules as it may deem necessary.

Mr. President, we do not act in a vacuum here. The Constitution itself provides clearly for the Senate of the United States the inherent power parliamentarily to govern itself. Under those inherent powers, I am at a complete loss to understand how anyone could seriously contemplate that a group of 98 Senators, elected by the people of the country, and having tremendous trust and responsibility imposed upon us, would convene in this Chamber and let chaos, pandemonium, and what has been exercised as a Pandora's box characterize its actions. It is simply pure nonsense. I happen to believe that those who make the argument know it to be so.

That leads me, Mr. President, to the next premise in my argument, because I must answer the question: "If you believe the Senate is a continuing body, then why do you support the Anderson resolution?"

I have answered that question so many times in the past, but will do so once again, for the record: Because the Senate has the right to proceed under article I, section 5, of the Constitution. So that the exact language will be in the RECORD, I will read it.

SECTION 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each [House] shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behavior, and, with the Concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

There are other parts to the section, but they do not relate to the matter before the Senate.

I have already pointed out that under the Constitution one-third of the membership of this body is elected every 2 years. We need to keep that operative fact in mind when we come to interpret article I, section 5, and its application to the exercise of the constitutional power by the Senate of the United States.

That is what the Vice President discussed in 1957; that is what he has discussed on several occasions during the past 2 days in this session of Congress—ably, with legal brilliance, and, up until this moment, unanswerably. There has not been a person in this debate who has made any rebuttal dent on the analysis made by the Vice President of the United States concerning the power of the Senate at the beginning of each new Congress to adopt rules governing its own procedure.

I said this morning that at a later time today I would answer what I consider to be the tortured construction given to the rulings made by the Vice President in the course of the debate today. Mr. President, I am a lawyer. In connection with the discussion of a legal issue, I am always concerned about the premises which are laid down both by the proponents and the opponents on the two sides of the issue.

Time and time again in the Senate, whenever I think anyone on the Republican side of the aisle is right on the merits of any issue before the Senate, I have been with him, because my job is to sit in the Senate and represent the legislative interests of the Nation, and not to represent partisan politics. I never have and I never will represent partisan politics.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I want to bear witness to the fact that today the able senior Senator from Oregon did a very courageous and a very fine thing when he commended the Vice President, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who happens to belong to a different political party, but who nevertheless demonstrated, as the able senior Senator from Oregon today said, an independence of judgment 2 years ago in rendering a decision which the able Senator from Oregon and I and many other Senators approved and applauded. Yet that decision was denounced here today.

So far as I am concerned, I merely want the RECORD to show that my friend from Oregon demonstrated once again his courage and his independence of judgment in what he did.

Mr. MORSE. I appreciate the kind remarks of my friend from California. He knows the high regard in which I hold him. On another occasion, as we make a report concerning a joint venture we took during the recent recess as delegates from the Senate to a foreign country for the inauguration of the President of Mexico, I shall discuss the wonderful representation which the senior Senator from California gave to this country in his capacity as a delegate from the Senate.

I want the Senator from California to know that I have always appreciated his friendship and his unfailing professional attitude of fairness when he and I found ourselves in disagreement in our respective views as to the merits of some issue. The comment he has just made is particularly appreciated because all I did this morning was to be true to the same principle to which the senior Senator from California has been true on many occasions in the Senate.

This morning I simply exercised again my obligation to the people of my State. I was exercising an honest independence of judgment on the merits of the issue in accordance with where the facts led. That is my job; it is a primary responsibility, under my code of political obligation, that each Senator owes his constituents—namely, to follow where the facts lead, not where the politicians lead. Of course, many times there is quite a difference.

So I wish to return to the rulings by the Vice President.

First, Mr. President, when the rulings were made, the question was raised, in what capacity did the Vice President rule? Did he rule as an officer of the executive branch of the Government? If not, in what capacity did he rule?

I am sure that when any Senator asked such a question, he knew it was a rhetorical question, if not a heckling one, because all Members of the Senate know that the Vice President of the United States sits in the chair by direction of the Constitution, as the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

That is the capacity in which he sits; and in that capacity he sits as an officer of the Senate. And as an officer of the Senate he even has, under some circumstances, voting privileges in the Senate—for instance, the privilege of casting his vote to break a tie. That is the capacity in which the Vice President sits. The innuendo of some of the questions which were put to the effect that here was an officer of the executive branch of the Government, seeking to impose his will upon a legislative body, simply had no merit to them.

So we proceed from that premise. He sits, under the Constitution, as the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and, in that capacity, as an officer of the Senate.

It was implied—none too kindly, I thought, in view of the form which some of the questions took—that he seemed to think he was sitting there as a judicial officer. But certainly nothing in the conduct of the Vice President or nothing in the rulings of the Vice President would justify that implication.

The Vice President pointed out—and now I shall paraphrase his remarks, but I shall do so accurately—that such rulings as the ones he has made both in 1957 and in 1959 were in answer to parliamentary inquiries put to him. That happens to be his duty as Presiding Officer of the Senate. Senators can disagree with the conclusions he reaches in his rulings; and Senators are adequately protected, under the procedures of the Senate; we can appeal from the decision of the Chair. Any of us who has been here any number of years knows that has occurred on many occasions.

He was not seeking to lay down a judicial decree at all. On the contrary, in each one of those rulings the Vice President has very ably and very meticulously made clear that he was not deciding the question as to whether a given rule or proposed rule or part of any rule was unconstitutional. If we read the transcript of the Vice President's statements every time he has spoken on this matter to the Senate, both in 1957 and in 1959, we find that he very carefully pointed out that when a proposed rule or a proposed action on a rule came to issue before this body, and when in his judgment it involved a constitutional question, he would put that constitutional question to the Senate itself for determination.

Mr. President, what could be fairer? What could be a more careful exercise of his functions as Presiding Officer of the Senate?

In answering parliamentary inquiries which were put to him—for instance, in 1957—in regard to a subsection of rule XXII, and again on yesterday and today, the Vice President said that in his opinion the parts of the rule which sought to impose upon a Senate, at the beginning of a new Congress, a voting requirement other than a majority vote requirement for the ending of debate were unconstitutional.

But having said that, he did not bind the Senate; and, therefore, I am at a loss to know what all the forensic shooting is about. He said, in effect, "When we get to that issue, I will put it to the Senate for determination as to whether the Senate believes it to be unconstitutional."

Then, Mr. President, as I interpreted some of the colloquy, I reached the conclusion that there were among us those who seemed to think the Vice President would be guilty of some violation of his rights and prerogatives as Presiding Officer if he, in making a ruling from the Chair, said, "Because I think this rule is unconstitutional, I now submit it to the Senate, tne determination of the question as to whether an objection which might be raised by a point of order or by other procedural process is valid on the ground that the rule or the subsection of the rule in question is in violation of the Constitution."

Mr. President, it is obvious that not only would he not be in violation of his prerogatives as Presiding Officer, but also that he would not be much of a Presiding Officer if, holding to the view that a given proposal involved an unconstitutionality subject to a point of order, he would not submit it to the Senate for determination.

But then it is said, in the next criticism of the ruling of the Vice President, that there is some inconsistency in the ruling that the Senate, under article I, section 5, has the right to determine its own rules of procedure, and the holding that at some later time it will have lost that right in respect to a rule which requires the limitation of debate by two-thirds vote.

Those who make that argument, I respectfully say, are not reading the Vice President's ruling from its four corners. They try, figuratively speaking, to take a forensic scissors and cut the Vice President's rulings in parts, and then take up just one part and discuss it as though it were his entire ruling. That, Mr. President, is a common forensic tactic sometimes exercised by those who have very weak arguments.

But it would be better, Mr. President, if they did not argue at all than to use that tactic, because what the Vice President said, when one takes his rulings from their four corners and reads them in their entirety, is that under article I, section 5, of the Constitution, each new Congress has the constitutional authority to determine its own procedures. And so, at the beginning of each session of the Congress, in the determination of those procedures the principle of majority vote shall prevail.

That is what the Vice President said, in legal meaning. It is easy to gloss over it. The Vice President did not say the Senate can lose a constitutional right. What the Vice President said is this, and I want to repeat it in the interest of clarity, and for the benefit of a political science graduate student who, sometime in the future, may be writing a master's thesis on this debate. By the way, I think the subject is worth a master's thesis for a political science department.

For the benefit of that thesis writer, Mr. President, I want to reiterate: The Vice President did not say a constitutional right was going to be lost. The Vice President said that, under the Constitution, at the beginning of each session of Congress, the Senate of the United States has the constitutional authority to determine its own rules.

Then he said, in effect, that in making that determination, a majority vote shall prevail. He did not say that in adopting rules for a given Congress, it could not bind itself in respect to a particular bit of Senate business, to a vote requiring other than a majority. That is the controlling point here, Mr. President, if Senators will not lose sight of the meaning of what the Vice President said.

Then the Vice President goes on in his ruling to say, in effect, if the Senate does not, in the beginning of a new Congress, exercise its constitutional right to adopt new rules, but proceeds without taking any rule action to run the Senate as it was run in the last Congress, it is to be presumed the Senate is proceeding under the rules of the last session of Congress.

There is nothing novel about that doctrine, Mr. President. We lawyers know what that doctrine is. If we proceed to make a record of conduct based upon the rules of the last session of the Congress, there comes a time—and it is not a very long time—when it is to be presumed that we have acquiesced to the proposition that the previous rules shall prevail in the new Congress.

I do not see how one can read the Vice President's ruling and reach any other meaning. I think the Vice President is absolutely right. That is why, Mr. President, yesterday some of us tried to be very careful. Some of our spokesmen got the floor—the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]—who are the ones I remember offhand—and carried out the instructions which we had all agreed upon in so-called liberal conferences, that an effort should be made at the beginning of the session to make clear that we would not acquiesce in the rules of the Senate which prevailed in the last Congress.

That is why the RECORD shows these parliamentary inquiries: Under what rule is the Senator from Texas proceeding? Under what rule is the Senator from Georgia proceeding? The fact that article I, section 5, of the Constitution provides that the Senate of the United States may adopt rules of procedure does not mean at the beginning of each new Congress it must adopt new rules.

The Vice President is quite correct in my opinion. Any failure at the beginning of a new session of Congress to adopt new rules and the actual performance—or, as it is called the specific performance—of proceeding under the old rules by the Senate constitute acquiescence in the old rules. That is what the Vice President held, and I think unanswerably it is correct.

We then move to the next premise or tenet involved in this series of rulings by the Vice President, about which there were many dissents or at least reservations expressed in the debate in the Senate. That is the reference to that subsection of rule XXII which imposes a two-thirds voting requirement of the membership of the Senate in order to limit debate.

The Vice President never said that in carrying out the procedures of the Senate it could not formally adopt a voting requirement other than a majority vote to carry out the parliamentary business of the Senate. But the Vice President did say that if such a rule is sought to be enforced upon a new Senate at a time when Members of a new Senate are trying to revise the two-thirds requirement, such a voting requirement reaching him at the desk would be held by him to be an unconstitutional voting requirement because of the clear implication that under article I, section 5 of the Constitution a majority rule should prevail.

As I read the Vice President's rulings that is what he said. Again I say it is completely correct. I interpret that to be one of the reasons why the Vice President has been so careful in his rulings to discuss the question of acquiescence in the old rules.

It has always been my position that if under the constutitional provision of the power of the Senate to adopt its own rules we want to change the rule, it is important and necessary to do it at the beginning of a new Congress. That is not because we are not a continuing body, but because in a new Congress, with one-third of the Members new Members or reelected Members, that is the time, if the Senate is going to determine formally what its rules shall be, to make the rules decision under article I, section 5. At that time it is quite proper for the Presiding Officer of the Senate to rule that in an issue before the Senate which raises the question whether new rules shall be adopted in toto—or a specific new rule—a question of constitutionality is involved, in that an old rule may be in violation of the exercise of the constitutional right to adopt new rules under article I, section 5.

That is the argument of the Vice President as I interpret it, and I think it is unanswerably sound. The Vice President says in his ruling, "If you take this issue to the new Senate, as is proposed by the Anderson motion, and the Senate then seeks to implement the Anderson motion with the Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case of New Jersey rule XXII proposal, you can do it by a majority vote, because the old rule XXII would not be applicable at that point; and if an attempt is made to bind the Senate with the old rule XXII then as the Presiding Officer of the Senate I express to you my opinion that such rule is unconstitutional with respect to its two-thirds vote requirement because it is in conflict with the clear implication of article I, section 5; and I shall put that constitutional question to the Senate for its own determination."

So, a clear, consistent, unwavering line of holding on this matter has been given us by the Vice President both in 1957 and 1959.

In warning us about the danger of an acquiescence which might be looked upon as an application of the rule of laches on the part of the Senate in regard to its right to adopt a rule by majority vote with respect to rule XXII, the Vice President over and over again made clear that we could become bound by the old rules of the Senate by our own affirmative conduct and action on the floor of the Senate, by proceeding under the old rules.

Mr. President, I think that is a fair summary of the Vice President's position, as I interpret his position. It should be added that there has been a very loose use in the debate by some debaters of two legal terms: constitutional right and constitutional privilege. There has been an attempt to leave the impression that the Vice President has ruled that one can lose a constitutional right. The Vice President has not so ruled at all. The Vice President has ruled that under the Constitution the constitutional fathers provided the Senate with the privilege of determining its own rules.

Mr. President, those rules can take a variety of forms. Hypothetically, the first Senate could have said, "The rules of procedure of the Senate shall be the parliamentary rules provided in such and such a parliamentary manual." "Robert's Rules of Order" was not in existence at that time. The reference might have been made to any manual.

Or in subsequent years the Senate could have said, "The parliamentary procedures of the Senate shall be the procedures of 'Robert's Rules of Order,' subject to the following modifications." The Senate has not seen fit to do that. It has drawn heavily upon standard works on parliamentary procedure, but it has written its own rules.

The Vice President has pointed out that we have carried out our constitutional prerogative from Congress to Congress. If we wish to be really technical, the fact is that we have adopted rules of the Senate on the basis of our conduct, actions, and acquiescence, time and time and time again. The record is replete with instances in which rules have been challenged, and attempts have been made to change them. In some instances such attempts have succeeded. But in the absence of specific action taken, we have adopted rules of the Senate at the beginning of each new Congress by our conduct of acquiescence. The Vice President did not spell it out in his able rulings, but I think it is clearly implied in his discussion that the time may come when, by acquiescence, the rules of a previous Congress, so far as the Senate is concerned, will apply.

Related to this subject is the question of a majority vote in the Senate. It has been said in this debate that those of us who argue that under the Constitution, in the absence of a provision to the contrary, the principle of majority vote is the rule are in error. Yet I think it is the clear implication of the Constitution of the United States that in the transaction of the legislative processes of the United States, a majority vote shall prevail on legislative matters unless there is specific provision to the contrary.

Our constitutional fathers knew how to provide for a voting requirement other than a majority vote when they desired to do so. I now read into the RECORD a list of specific instances in the Constitution in which they have provided for a vote other than majority vote.

Article I, section 3: Two-thirds of Members of Senate present required for conviction in cases of impeachment.

Article I, section 5: Each House may, with concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member.

Article I, section 7: Veto may be overridden if two-thirds of each House agree to pass bill.

Article II, section 2: President may make treaties with concurrence of two-thirds of Senators present.

Article V: Congress may propose amendments whenever two-thirds of both Houses may deem it necessary; a convention to propose amendments must be called on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States; amendment must be ratified by the legislatures or conventions of three-fourths of the States.

Amendment XIV, section 3: Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove disability imposed by this section on persons who have engaged in rebellion against the United States.

As we lawyers would say, those are the words of limitation in the Constitution of the United States in regard to voting.

So far as the Constitution is concerned, the clear implication is that, in the absence of being confronted with one of the issues raised by the particular sections just referred to, the vote shall be by majority vote. Therefore, when we come to article I, section 5, in respect to the constitutional power of both Houses of Congress to adopt their own rules of procedure, the clear implication of the Constitution is that the exercise of rulemaking power under that article and section of the Constitution shall be by majority vote.

In my judgment that is what the Vice President has been telling us—and I think rightly so—but now we come to what I consider to be the most difficult question of all connected with this subject.

Does it follow, therefore, that in adopting our own parliamentary rules of procedure we cannot impose upon ourselves, through our rules, a voting percentage other than a majority in the transaction of Senate business? My answer is that, of course, we can. We have done it many times. Any parliamentary body can do it, in the absence of some organic law prohibition.

There is nothing in the Constitution, for example, which prohibits a cloture rule in the Senate requiring two-thirds of the membership of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, three-fifths, or any other percentage we might name to close debate.

The Vice President never has held, either by word or implication, that we could not adopt such a rule; yet in the debate today we found that some of our colleagues are apparently laboring under the false notion that the Vice President is saying that if we adopt a new cloture rule in the Senate it must provide for cloture by a majority vote.

He never even hinted at such a ruling. What the Vice President held was that when a new Congress proceeds to adopt new rules under article I, section 5, we do not have imposed upon us an old rule requiring a two-thirds vote; and that this is so because article I, section 5 clearly implies that the authority can be exercised by a majority vote, the simple reason being that the constitutional fathers set out by their words of limitation, those instances in which they sought to apply a vote other than a majority vote. However, they did not say in the Constitution, and it is not implied in the Constitution, that when we come to adopt these rules, they must be limited to requirements for majority votes.

That has been lost sight of in this debate. To put it in another way, there has been a forensic jumping from one facet of this issue to another facet of the issue in regard to the application of article I, section 5. To repeat it for purpose of clarity—and I hope it will be clear—when the Vice President ruled on the application of article I, section 5, of the Constitution, he did not say that in the adoption of new rules of the Senate we must limit ourselves to a majority vote rule for ending debate. However he did say, and rightly so, that in exercising that right to make our own rules, it shall be done by a majority of a quorum of the Senate, and that the majority of a quorum of the Senate would have the right, under article I, section 5 of the Constitution to adopt any percentage for limiting debate in the Senate it wished to provide.

I respectfully submit that that is the clear meaning of the Vice President's rulings in answer to the parliamentary inquiries which have been put to him. Consistent, clear, sound.

Sometimes this morning my colleagues seemed to be going on the assumption that if we went ahead and operated under the old rule XXII, and it was proposed to modify the old rule XXII, it could not be done by a majority vote. What the Vice President said was that in his opinion we could change it by majority vote, because any attempt to prevent a majority from determining its own rules under article I, section 5 would be in violation of that article and section. However, that majority could impose whatever percentage it wished to impose in order to end debate in the Senate.

In other words, what the Vice President said was that the act of adopting the rule is one thing, and the content of the rule that we adopt to govern us is quite another thing. So a majority could conscientiously and sincerely believe that a majority should not end debate and provide in adopting a new rule that a two-thirds percentage would thereafter be necessary to close debate for the life of that Congress, unless changed by the Senate in accordance with the rules it had adopted.

Again I say that no matter from what angle we approach these rulings of the Vice President, they stand up and are sound.

I believe I have covered those things I had in mind this morning when I said to my colleagues I would answer the arguments which had been made in the debate against the position taken by the Vice President.

Now I turn to an entirely different phase of the problem of seeking to adopt a new set of rules in the Senate in relation to governing the debate to the end of limiting filibusters.

Of all the specious arguments that have been offered in defense of the present rule XXII, none is any more specious than the argument that the Founding Fathers intended their Constitution to provide not only checks upon unbridled majority rule, but to give to a minority an outright veto power over the majority.

That the Constitution affords the most admirable and delicate balance of power ever drawn up to govern human affairs is a universal truism. Such a balance is not achieved except by providing for divisions of power and authority.

But the Constitution contains nothing approaching a minority veto power in the legislative process. The theory of John Calhoun that the Constitution was supposed to require the consent of all contending parties in the formulation of public policy has been thoroughly demolished by history. Now the diehards have fallen back upon the Senate rules in their effort to sustain the notion that nullification of some kind or another was intended by the Founding Fathers.

Since this argument found its way into public print some weeks ago, I have gone to the one best single source of the intents and purposes of the Founding Fathers to see just what they did intend to create with their Constitution. I have reread the "Federalist Papers" completely, and gave special care to the sections dealing with the protection of minorities. Nowhere in these documents, written by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, is there a shred of evidence to sustain the proposition we have heard that the filibuster in some way carries out a basic principle or purpose of the Constitution, or of the people who wrote it and presented it to the American people for their consideration.

In brief, the filibuster argument is the old nullification issue with a new twist. Instead of urging nullification after the fact, the defenders of the two-thirds rule, either two-thirds of the membership of the Senate or of those voting, are saying that nullification should exist before the fact. By use of the filibuster, they would enable a minority to prevent a public policy from being formulated at all.

The answer of Hamilton, Madison, and Jay remains the same. The main reason they advocated the Constitution to the American people was that a minority was then able to exercise a veto over the majority under the Articles of Confederation.

In "The Federalist, No. 15" Hamilton wrote as follows about the nature of government and the Articles of Confederation:

> But if we are unwilling to be placed in this perilous situation; if we still will adhere to the design of a national government or, which is the same thing, of a superintending power, under the direction of a common council, we must resolve to incorporate into our plan those ingredients which may be considered as forming the characteristic difference between a league and a government; we must extend the authority of the Union to the persons of the citizens, the only proper objects of government.
> Government implies the power of making laws. It is essential to the idea of a law that it be attended with a sanction; or, in other words, a penalty or punishment for disobedience. If there be no penalty annexed to disobedience, the resolutions or commands which pretend to be laws will, in fact, amount to nothing more than advice or recommendation * * *.
> There was a time when we were told that breaches by the States of the regulations of the Federal authority were not to be expected; that a sense of common interest would preside over the conduct of the respective members, and would beget a full compliance with all the constitutional requisitions of the Union. This language, at the present day, would appear as wild as a great part of what we now hear from the same quarter will be thought, when we shall have received further lessons from that best oracle of wisdom, experience.

Hamilton went on, in this exceedingly interesting writing, to say:

> If, therefore, the measures of the confederacy cannot be executed without the intervention of the particular administrations, there will be little prospect of their being executed at all. The rulers of the respective members, whether they have a constitutional right to do it or not, will undertake to judge of the propriety of the measures themselves. They will consider the conformity of the thing proposed or required to their immediate interests or aims; the momentary conveniences or inconveniences that would attend its adoption. All this will be done; and in a spirit of interested and suspicious scrutiny without that knowledge of national circumstances and reasons of state, which is essential to a right judgment and that strong predilection in favor of local objects, which can hardly fail to mislead the decision. * * *
> In our case, the concurrence of 13 distinct sovereign wills is requisite, under the confederation, to the complete execution of every important measure that proceeds from the Union. It has happened as was to have been foreseen. The measures of the Union have not been executed; the delinquencies of the States have, step by step, matured themselves to an extreme, which has, at length, arrested all the wheels of the National Government, and brought them to an awful stand.

Mr. President, Hamilton was deploring the power of the minority to jeopardize the interests of the Union. This philosophy of the principles of political science runs through Hamilton's writings. I care not where one reads his writings; there it is, Mr. President.

In Hamilton's view, it was the lack of a national enforcing power, the absence of national supremacy, which was the fatal defect of the "Articles of Confederation." In papers 15 through 22—that is, in 8 of them—the failures of the confederation are enumerated. The absence of national supremacy over the Union is the key to nearly all these failures.

In more specific terms, Hamilton in No. 22 deals with the provision of the "Articles of Confederation" which gave an equal vote to each State in the Congress, regardless of its population or the size of its delegation. I quote:

> The right of equal suffrage among the States is another exceptionable part of the confederation. Every idea of proportion and every rule of fair representation conspire to condemn a principle, which gives to Rhode Island an equal weight in the scale of power with Massachusetts, or Connecticut, or New York; and to Delaware an equal voice in the national deliberations with Pennsylvania, or Virginia, or North Carolina. Its operation contradicts the fundamental maxim of republican government, which requires that the sense of the majority should prevail. Sophistry may reply that sovereigns are equal, and that a majority of the votes of the States will be a majority of confederated America. But this kind of logical legerdemain will never counteract the plain suggestions of justice and common sense. It may happen that this majority of States is a small minority of the American people; and two-thirds of the people of America could not long be persuaded, upon the credit of artificial distinction and syllogistic subtleties, to submit their interests to the management and disposal of one-third.

That was Hamilton's view. O Mr. President, how history repeats itself. Sometimes one thinks there is nothing new. At least, I think that is about true when it comes to the statement that there is nothing new in the current argument, in the year 1959, because the framework of the argument and the debate over the rules of the Senate involve many of the same differences in regard to the vesting of political power about which Madison and Hamilton wrote.

Hamilton goes on to say that in the Constitution "two-thirds of the whole number must consent to the most important resolutions."

Then he says:

> But this does not obviate the impropriety of an equal vote between States of the most unequal dimensions and populousness. * * * To give a minority a negative upon the majority (which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision), is, in its tendence, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser.

That could be 1959, could it not? Mr. President, when you talk to me about a constitutional theory, you simply have to talk to me about the political and governmental philosophy which dominated the thinking of the Founding Fathers and which brought this constitutional system into being. A little research and homework usually supply one with such facts as I am presenting to the Senate this evening; namely, that as a principal exponent of the new Constitution, Hamilton made very clear in the Federalist papers his position on majority rule and his point of view that a majority should not be controlled by a minority.

It is a general principle about which I am talking, a principle to be applied to specific issues as they arise from time to time in the administration of Government. We have such an issue before us. My longstanding opposition to the Senate rule of cloture is based upon this historic principle, enunciated so clearly in the Federalist papers. In fact, I have expressed the point of view many times that the Constitution really cannot be interpreted outside "The Federalist" papers; and the Federalist papers might generally be described simply as statements of the principles of political philosophy which governed the thinking of the men who brought the Constitution into being.

Professorial as it may be, let me say to the present Presiding Officer of the Senate that there comes a time, in carrying out his duties, when the Presiding Officer owes it to the people he represents to go to the books, particularly when it is argued in debate as it has been so many times during the forensic battles here over the filibuster issue, that at the time when the Union came into being, it never was contemplated that the principle of majority rule should prevail.

Library research shows to the contrary. "The Federalist" papers, in my judgment—and now my words should be set forth in quotation marks—are really part and parcel of the Constitution, in the sense that they are so essential to an interpretation of it, so far as the intentions and purposes of the constitutional fathers are concerned.

So I say that a study of those expressed intentions shows very clearly that our constitutional fathers did not contemplate that a minority should be able to control a majority, as has been possible for so long in the Senate under the cloture rule; and later tonight, when I leave this section of my speech, I shall speak at some length concerning the legitimacies of a filibuster and the limitations upon those legitimacies.

Mr. President, is it conceivable that the authors of the Constitution meant a minority to have an outright veto over the majority in the adoption of legislation but kept quite about it in expounding and explaining the Constitution to the American people of their time? That is just about what the defenders of the filibuster are saying when they try to invoke the blessing of the Founding Fathers upon the present rule XXII or the Johnson substitute.

Hamilton thought it bad enough that the States had an equal vote in the Congress of the Confederation. I say it is simply unthinkable that he or any of the other framers of the Constitution intended to give a minority of States a veto power over the majority.

It is quite true that in addition to the checks and balances between the three branches of the Federal Government and those created through federalism itself, the Senate also has, in its constitutional establishment, elements that provide checks upon majority rule.

I do not for a moment deny that the Senate of the United States, as created by the Constitution, was intended to supply certain checks upon an unbridled majority. It was, and is, an important check upon the majority of the American people. But the question is, what are the checks, and do they include the use of rules to prevent a majority of the Senate's Members from coming to a decision? Do the checks upon the majority extend to a veto power for the minority? It is from "The Federalist" papers that I intend to show that the checks inherent in the Senate are limitations, and do not include any minority veto power through the filibuster.

I have already cited the objections to equal representation of the States in the Congress under the Articles of Confederation that was one of the principal reasons for the failure of that organization; it was also one of the principal objections to it discussed by Hamilton.

In "The Federalist No. 58," attributed to either Hamilton or Madison, the representation of the States under the new Constitution is discussed. The compromise that gave representation to the States on the basis of population in the House of Representatives and on a equal basis in the Senate is, of course, the most famous of all the compromises in the constitutional convention.

I quote:

There is a peculiarity in the Federal Constitution which insures a watchful attention in a majority both of the people and of their representatives to a constitutional augmentation of the latter. The peculiarity lies in this, that one branch of the legislature is a representation of citizens, the other of the States; in the former, consequently, the larger States will have most weight; in the latter, the advantage will be in favor of the small States. From this circumstance it may with certainty be inferred that the larger States will be strenuous advocates for increasing the number and weight of that part of the legislature in which their influence predominates. And it so happens that four only of the largest will have a majority of the whole votes in the House of Representatives. Should the representatives or people, therefore, of the smaller States oppose at any time a reasonable addition of Members, a coalition of a very few States will be sufficient to overrule the opposition; a coalition which, notwithstanding the rivalship and local prejudices which might prevent it on ordinary occasions, would not fail to take place, when not merely prompted by common interest, but justified by equity and the principles of the Constitution.

The author felt that any disposition on the part of the thinly populated States to prevent, through their representation in the Senate, an enlargement of the House of Representatives, would be overridden by the House by its power of the purse strings. The discussion in this section clearly implies that the Senate will be motivated more in proportion to the interests of the States with small populations, while the House will be motivated more by the States with large populations. Yet the author goes into detail to show how the House will be able to prevail.

If it were intended that the Senate should be able to block outright a decision of the majority of people, instead of balancing it only with a disproportionate representation of the smaller States, surely that fact would have been brought out in this discussion.

But it was not. The point of the author's discussion of the House of Representatives would seem to be to show that even though the Senate consists of States, rather than people, still the States will not be able to thwart or forestall the wishes of the majority of people. To check them, yes; to delay, and perhaps modify, yes; but never to block them.

In "The Federalist No. 62," also attributed to either Hamilton or Madison, the Senate itself is discussed in detail. It lists the purposes of a Senate, as follows:

First:

A Senate, as a second branch of the legislative assembly, distinct from, and dividing the power with, a first, must be in all cases a salutary check on the Government. It doubles the security to the people by requiring the concurrence of two distinct bodies in schemes of usurpation or perfidy, where the ambition or corruption of one would otherwise be sufficient.

Second:

The necessity of a Senate is not less indicated by the propensity of all single and numerous assemblies to yield to the impulse of sudden and violent passions, and to be seduced by factious leaders into intemperate and pernicious resolutions.

Third:

Another defect to be supplied by a Senate lies in a want of due acquaintance with the objects and principles of legislation. It is not possible that an assembly of men called for the most part from pursuits of a private nature, continued in appointment for a short time, and led by no permanent motive to devote the intervals of public occupation to a study of the laws, the affairs, and the comprehensive interests of their country should, if left wholly to themselves, escape a variety of important errors in the exercise of their legislative trust * * *.

Fourth:

The mutability in the public councils arising from a rapid succession of new members, however qualified they may be, points out in the strongest manner the necessity of some stable institution in the Government. Every new election in the States is found to change one-half of the representatives. From this change of men must proceed a change of opinions; and from a change of opinions, a change of measures. But a continual change even of good measures is inconsistent with every rule of prudence and every prospect of success.

Fifth:

A fifth desideratum, illustrating the utility of a Senate, is the want of a due sense of national character. Without a select and stable member of the Government, the esteem of foreign powers will not only be forfeited by an unenlightened and variable policy, proceeding from the causes already mentioned, but the national councils will not possess that sensibility to the opinion of the world, which is perhaps not less necessary in order to merit, than it is to obtain, its respect and confidence.

Sixth:

The want, in some important cases, of a due responsibility in the Government to the people, arising from that frequency of elections which in other cases produces this responsibility. * * * The proper remedy for this defect must be an additional body in the legislative department which, having sufficient permanency to provide for such objects as require a continued attention, and a train of measures, may be justly and effectually answerable for the attainment of those objects.

Mr. President, I digress from the manuscript long enough to make this comment on "Federalist Paper No. 62." The argument I now make is by way of implication, but I think it is a very fair interpretation of this portion of "Federalist Paper No. 62." I do not see how anyone can read it and study its meaning without finding there pretty good evidence of the position of those of us who have held that the Senate is a continuing body.

Do not forget, Mr. President, that these portions of "The Federalist Papers," in part, point out the views of the writers of the papers on position of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in the structure of our Government. Here is a paper which deals with the Senate. How can one reach any other conclusion, from what is said here about the importance of having a branch of the Government which possesses these features and qualities, than that it was contemplated the Senate would be a body which carried on from year to year? Listen, Mr. President:

A fifth desideratum, illustrating the utility of a senate is the want of a due sense of national character. Without a select and stable member of the government, the esteem of foreign powers will not only be forfeited by an unenlightened and variable policy, proceeding from the causes already mentioned, but the national councils will not possess that sensibility to the opinion of the world, which is perhaps not less necessary in order to merit, than it is to obtain its respect and confidence.

I do not mean to read anything into the papers, but is it not obvious that it was contemplated from the very beginning, as the practice of the Senate from the beginning shows, that this body was to be considered a continuing and stable part of the Government to carry on the work of the national councils and maintain our governmental relations with foreign powers?

I do not want to overdraw the argument. But the language of "The Federalist Papers" themselves indicates very clearly, I think, that this body, the Senate, was set up to represent the States, and that the representation was a continuous representation of the States. The States did not go out of existence every 2 years. The Senate was set up to carry out procedures in connection with the business of the National Government essential to the Union. Therefore, from the very beginning, we find Senate committees functioning during recess periods, carrying on Government business. Not so with the House, save and except in connection with the qualifications which I mentioned earlier in this discussion.

In my opinion, one of the most interesting examples in the early history of Congress of the recognition of the difference between the Senate and the House in respect to what and whom each body represents—the Senate, the States; and the House, the people—is to be found in the early practice that, when a constituent came from a certain State to Washington, he did not come to the office of a Senator.

He came to the office of a Representative, and the Representative took him to the office of the Senator if the constituents' business involved State business, which concerned the attention of the Senate. Of course, I do not have to tell my colleagues in the Senate that that situation no longer prevails. In fact, it sometimes seems to me constituents come to the Senator first. The Senate in some instances has come to do work which was originally intended by the constitutional fathers to be performed by the Representatives and not by the Senators.

I have joshed some of my House colleagues about this, Mr. President, and they are very good natured about it. They agree to the historical fact, and point out that really what has happened is a recognition on the part of constituents that a Senator has a joint obligation to represent both the State and the people of the State. That was not always the case. The 17th amendment had a great deal to do with the change.

Mr. President, these are the reasons for inclusion of the Senate in the Constitution. There is nothing here about a veto power. There is nothing here about a concurrent majority, or the need for all parties or sections to agree to a public policy.

And how was the Senate constituted so as to fulfill its purposes? First, certain qualifications for membership were provided. A Member must be at least 30 years of age and a citizen for at least 9 years. The second means of creating a Senate to meet the needs listed was to require that its Members be selected by the State legislatures. That requirement no longer concerns us.

The third means of distinguishing the Senate was to give the States equal representation. I quote again from the Federalist papers:

> The equality of representation in the Senate is another point which, being evidently the result of compromise between the opposite pretensions of the large and the small States, does not call for much discussion. If indeed it be right, that among a people thoroughly incorporated into one nation, every district ought to have a proportional share in the government, and that among independent and sovereign States, bound together by a simple league, the parties, however unequal in size, ought to have an equal share in the common councils, it does not appear to be without some reason that in a compound republic, partaking both of the national and federal character, the government ought to be founded on a mixture of the principles of proportional and equal representation. * * *
> In this spirit it may be remarked, that the equal vote allowed to each State is at once a constitutional recognition of the portion of sovereignty remaining in the individual States, and an instrument for preserving that residuary sovereignty. So far the equality ought to be no less acceptable to the large than to the small States; since they are not less solicitous to guard, by every possible expedient, against an improper consolidation of the States into one simple Republic.
> Another advantage accruing from this ingredient in the Constitution of the Senate is the additional impediment it must prove against improper acts of legislation. No law or resolution can now be passed without the concurrence, first, of a majority of the people, and then, of a majority of the States. It must be acknowledged that this complicated check on legislation may in some instances be injurious as well as beneficial; and that the peculiar defense which it involves in favor of the smaller States would be more rational, if any interest common to them, and distinct from those of the other States, would otherwise be exposed to peculiar danger. But as the larger States will always be able, by their power over the supplies, to defeat unreasonable exertions of this prerogative of the lesser States, and as the facility and excess of the lawmaking seem to be the diseases to which our governments are most liable, it is not impossible that this part of the Constitution may be more convenient in practice than it appears to many in contemplation.

The treatise also makes clear that the 6-year term was intended to give to Senators the tenure they need to serve the purposes for which the Senate was created.

There are two other citations from "The Federalist" papers to which I wish to refer. One occurs in the discussion of representation in "The Federalist," No. 54. The subject under discussion is that of the counting of slaves in establishing representation. But in it is found this statement:

> Under the proposed Constitution, the Federal acts will take effect without the necessary intervention of the individual States. They will depend merely on the majority of votes in the Federal Legislature, and consequently each vote, whether proceeding from a large or small State, or a State more or less wealthy or powerful, will have an equal weight and efficacy.

I invite attention to this statement again, Mr. President, because it is very important in this discussion of the philosophy which should be followed by the Senate on this whole issue of whether the Senate ought to adopt a rule for majority vote to limit debate. "The Federalist" papers state:

> They—
> Meaning the Federal acts—
> will depend merely on the majority of votes in the Federal Legislature.

Certainly that statement will not appear if the writers of the Constitution intended that a minority in either House could forestall and prevent legislation it opposed.

And finally, in "The Federalist No. 58," there is an even more explicit declaration of the meaning of the Founding Fathers. The paper discusses certain charges against the House of Representatives by opponents of the Constitution, but I think the tenor of the reply is such that it applies as much to the Senate as it does to the House. Certainly if the Senate were meant to be excepted, that exception would have been noted.

The treatise is attributed either to Hamilton or to Madison, and I quote from it:

> As connected with the objection against the number of representatives may properly be here noticed that which has been suggested against the number made competent for legislative business. It has been said that more than a majority ought to have been required for a quorum; and in particular cases, if not in all, more than a majority of a quorum for a decision. That some advantages might have resulted from such a precaution, cannot be denied. It might have been an additional shield to some particular interests, and another obstacle generally to hasty and partial measures. But these considerations are outweighed by the inconveniences in the opposite scale. In all cases where justice or the general good might require new laws to be passed, or active measures to be pursued, the fundamental principle of free government would be reversed.

I leave the quotation for a moment, Mr. President, to place emphasis upon the statement. I do not know where one can go in historical documents to find a clearer statement of the philosophy and beliefs of our constitutional fathers in regard to the principle of majority vote rule. It is pointed out that they might have adopted a rule requiring more than a majority for a quorum in order to transact business. It is said:

> That some advantages might have resulted from such a precaution, cannot be denied. It might have been an additional shield to some particular interests, and another obstacle generally to hasty and partial measures. But these considerations are outweighed by the inconveniences in the opposite scale. In all cases where justice or the general good might require new laws to be passed, or active measures to be pursued, the fundamental principle of free government would be reversed.

The fundamental principle of free government would have been reversed, they say, had they required more than a majority of a quorum for a decision. That is what I meant when I said earlier this afternoon that there is hardly anything new in argument. At least there is hardly anything new in arguments about respective contentions concerning the procedural administration of government. The argument advanced at the birth of our Nation is the same argument which some of us have been using for years on the floor of the Senate, in support of a rule in the Senate that would permit the passage of legislation by a majority vote.

It cannot be passed by majority vote in the Senate so long as we tolerate a rule which permits a minority to stop us from ever reaching a vote. That is an illustration of what I shall discuss at greater length tonight when I take up the relationship between procedural rights and substantive rights.

It is a procedure of the Senate which denies to the American people their substantive legislative rights in these halls. It is a procedure which must be modified if the people of the country are to enjoy the right to have legislation passed by majority vote in the Senate, that legislation, in turn, to be subjected to the other checks which are available under the Constitution for protecting the public interest from a runaway majority.

As I shall say later tonight—I mention it now only in passing—there has been a great deal of discussion in the debate this year, as there has been in past years, about the two-thirds vote being a check upon a misguided majority. Of course, that argument does not take into account the clear constitutional checks which run throughout our governmental system, protecting the American people from runaway majorities. One of the difficulties in any debate on the so-called checks-and-balances theory is that usually someone wants to talk about a tiny, narrow segment of the subject matter, and ignore the totality of checks which exist in our constitutional system.

To impose the will of the minority upon the Senate by a cloture rule such as now exists, or one such as is proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] is not necessary to protect the American people from a runaway majority, for reasons I shall point out later.

There is nothing new in what I have just stated. Here were the creators of this great constitutional system of checks and balances. In the very act of creating it, they pointed out to us that if we deny the principle of majority vote on legislation, then the principle of free government will be reversed. That is our position as we plead year after year for the modification of a rule which permits of minority control of the Senate and the passage of legislation at the sufferance of a willful minority.

Coming back to the "Federalist Papers," I continue with the quotation:

> It would be no longer the majority that would rule: the power would be transferred to the minority. Were the defensive privilege limited to particular cases, an interested minority might take advantage of it to screen themselves from equitable sacrifices to the general weal, or, in particular emergencies, to extort unreasonable indulgences. Lastly, it would facilitate and foster the baneful practice of secessions; a practice which has shown itself even in States where a majority only is required; a practice subversive of all the principles of order and regular government; a practice which leads more directly to public convulsions, and the ruin of popular governments, than any other which has yet been displayed among us.

That is pretty strong language. That is not the language of any of the liberals in the Senate in 1959. That is the language of the constitutional fathers which we liberals heartily endorse and applaud.

We would not phrase language stronger than the language found in the Federalist papers themselves, in support of the principle of majority rule; and yet in this debate there are colleagues in the Senate who have sought to give the American people the impression that there is no basis in constitutional theory for our point of view, namely, that it was contemplated that majority rule should prevail in the Senate. To those Senators I say, "Go to the library and do some book work. You need it. Reread the Federalist papers if you ever read them."

The Federalist papers stand as a great epitome of the point of view which we liberals have urged in the Senate for years, in support of the principle of majority rule.

FOUNDING FATHERS WERE EXPLICIT

From these quotations I think it is clear that the men who drafted the Constitution were explicit about the checks and balances they wrote into it. They explained what they were. It makes no sense to me for a dissident minority of Americans to come along some 172 years later and try to maintain that the Founding Fathers meant something else, too, even though they did not say at the time what it was.

I think it is also perfectly clear that no nullification was ever written into the Constitution. Certainly it was not contemplated that States or their subdivisions could defy a national policy once it was established. It is pure sophistry to argue that nullification by a minority was to be permitted instead by use of a parliamentary device that would prevent the policy from being established at all.

The question we have to decide is whether the Senate wants to permit this device to continue. In my opinion the requirement of two-thirds to close debate, whether two-thirds of the Members or two-thirds of those present, amounts to a thwarting of the purpose of the Constitution. It is a constitutional amendment in disguise that has gained a certain amount of acceptance through acquiescence.

It is time we got back to the original purpose of the Founding Fathers and of the U.S. Senate.

That purpose is to give reflection, continuity, and dispassion to legislation. These certainly do not extend to giving a veto power to the dissident minority. That is a usurpation that has occurred through rule XXII, and it is one we should put a stop to.

The Constitution is clear about when a two-thirds vote is required to make a decision. Those who want to add to those instances might better be honest about their intentions and come forward with a constitutional amendment than to seek to achieve their purpose by means of the Senate rules.

I am simply opposed to nullification in any form. No one has taken to the floor of the Senate more often than I to defend protection for a minority. But protecting a minority right does not include the destruction of a majority right. The right of a majority of legislators to come to a decision is just as important to this democracy as the "supreme law of the land" clause of the Constitution.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that in this historic debate Senators will find enough time to do their book work and will go back and study the great documents which brought this Republic into being, and rededicate themselves to the proposition that the people of this country have a right to have them uphold, namely, that a rule of majority vote in the Senate will control in the passage of legislation. If it is to control in the passage of legislation, then it means control, I may say, in connection with the procedures which permit of the passage of legislation.

That brings me to a discussion of how we are going to protect minority rights in the Senate in connection with the passage of legislation while at the same time permit the majority to exercise the wisdom of its judgment on legislation? It is this position of the senior Senator from Oregon which seems to be most misunderstood. At least it is this position which is so frequently represented by those critics of the senior Senator from Oregon who would try to make of him a walking house of inconsistency. There is nothing inconsistent about my position on filibusters. I wish to restate it very briefly.

I have always stood for the modification of the rule of cloture in the Senate which prohibits a vote from ever occurring on a matter of business before the Senate. It is that kind of filibuster that I have always opposed with complete consistency, and always will, because a filibuster designed and permissible now under rule XXII to prevent a vote from ever occurring subjects the Senate to a rule by minority. It permits a minority to destroy majority rights in the Senate. Our objective should be to protect the minority but to see to it that the minority has an adequate opportunity and time to try to change itself into a majority. That goes to the whole heart of the matter, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. President, as I said earlier today, I am one liberal who admits that he filibusters. I am the only one I know of in the Senate who has ever stood on the floor of the Senate and said, "I am participating in a filibuster."

I suppose in a certain sense this is a filibuster tonight. I said in the beginning that one of the purposes of my speech is to stop a vote on the Anderson motion tonight. I expect to be successful in that objective, at least on the basis of my present good feeling.

It is one thing to filibuster to stop what is called a steamroller in the Senate, to stop a majority from taking advantage of a parliamentary minority; it is quite another thing to filibuster in the Senate under a program which is aimed to defeat the right of the majority to express itself by way of the passage of legislation, which in turn will be subject to the checks which our constitutional system provides, and about which I shall speak later.

I have filibustered, and will again, for the length of time necessary to make certain that we have laid before the Senate the evidence on the merits of a legislative issue, and which we believe the Senate and the country ought to consider before a final vote is taken on the issue. I have participated in that kind of filibuster.

Two come to mind immediately, the first, my filibuster on the tidelands legislative issue of 1953; the second, my filibuster in respect to the atomic-energy bill of 1954. We protected minority rights. I have frequently said that if only a few more Senators had joined our small group for just a few more days, we would have become a majority in the tidelands fight. Let us look at the record. Let us look at the shift that started. The final evidence shows that quite a bit of shifting took place during that debate. Senators who had earlier announced they were opposed to us, finally voted with us. What happened? I believe two things happened. First, I believe that our appeal to reason caused them to change their judgment on the merits of the issue, because we did not let it come to a vote immediately, and thus forced a consideration of it on the merits. Second, I believe they heard from the country.

That is another justifiable purpose of a filibuster. It is not aimed at preventing a vote from ever occurring. I believe that the filibuster on the tidelands issue caused many people in this country to inform themselves about the tidelands issue.

As they informed themselves and had their attention called, as we called their attention to it, time and time again, to the fact that on two great historic occasions the Supreme Court of the United States had held that the paramount interest in the tidelands lay in all the people of the country, and not only in those of the coastal States, the people started to make known to Senators that they thought the tidelands should be preserved for all the people, and not be given away to the coastal States.

In any event, as was brought out by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] in the debate already this year, when he reflected upon the famous tidelands filibuster of 1953, there can be no doubt that our discussion of tidelands and the Continental Shelf, both of which we said were involved in the issue, made it possible for us to get an agreement relative to the Continental Shelf. We were thus able to protect the interests of the American people in the Continental Shelf, under which there is more oil than there is under the tidelands.

In my judgment, that kind of filibuster is always justified. But it could have been turned into an unjustifiable filibuster. However, I made it clear—if Senators will go to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, they will see that I stated it not once, but several times—that I would not participate in a filibuster on the tidelands bill beyond a period of time when it was perfectly clear that we had accomplished all the good we could accomplish in getting the facts before the American people and before the Senate.

Of course, Mr. President, I never have filibustered, and never will, off the subject matter before the Senate. I find there is always plenty to say on any of these major issues, and one has a duty, I think—and a rather sacred duty—in the use of this desk in the Senate to confine oneself in debate, even though it is a prolonged debate, to the educational process of presenting to the American people what one considers to be the facts and the contentions which ought to be considered by his constituency concerning the issue which has been the subject of filibuster.

In 1953 we did not filibuster to prevent a vote from ever occurring on the tidelands bill. We could have done so, but we would not, although I think the debate ought to have gone on for about a week longer. Had it gone on for about a week longer, I think the bill would have failed of passage, because I believe public opinion was fast coming to our position. It has been my observation that this body has a canny ability to reflect public opinion, once public opinion has been stirred up.

Then we had the famous filibuster of 1954 on the atomic energy bill, when the Republican majority leader brought to the Senate of the United States in midafternoon an atomic energy bill of more than 100 pages in length, which had been rushed through the House of Representatives that afternoon with less than 2½ hours of debate. As the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, the majority leader asked for a unanimous consent agreement to vote on that atomic energy bill before the close of the session that day. I could not believe my ears. It was perfectly obvious that an overwhelming majority of the Senate had never read the bill. In view of the nature of the workload which confronts us in the Senate, those of us who were not on the committee could not have been expected to be familiar with the bill. We needed the education which goes along with debate in the Senate and a discussion of the committee report on the bill. Therefore, I objected.

That displeased the majority leader. The RECORD will show that he charged me with trying to exercise some kind of one-man dictatorial power over the Senate. That, of course, was a laughable charge. I replied that what he really was proposing was a repeal of the unanimous-consent rule of the Senate. I suggested that if he thought that was desirable, he should propose it and see how many votes he would get.

The RECORD will show that I assured him I knew how many votes he would not get—95; and that if he considered it a bit further, he would not even get his own vote, because the unanimous-consent rule was adopted by the Senate to protect the Senate from just such steamroller tactics as he tried to stage on that afternoon.

The majority leader then made clear to me that unless I acceded to his unanimous-consent agreement, I could start talking. I told him I would do that with pleasure. What he overlooked was that there was an army of Senators behind me, to use a figure of speech. He soon discovered that there was a whole group in the Senate who joined forces immediately, although we had not had a single meeting in advance. In fact, as the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] would tell us if he were here tonight, as I proceeded to talk the liberal forces in the Senate organized themselves around the Senator from New Mexico. I received messages from them from time to time as I proceeded to discuss the subject and consumed the time long enough for the forces in the Senate to organize a prolonged debate against the atomic energy bill of 1954, a bill under which the Republican administration sought to give away the whole atomic energy program of this country, amounting to from $12 billion to $14 billion, which had been paid for by the taxpayers. The administration sought to give it away to the private monopolies of the Nation. It was one of the most unconscionable legislative programs which have come out of the Eisenhower administration—and there have been many unscionable legislative proposals by it.

But the interesting thing, Mr. President, is that we organized a bipartisan opposition to the atomic energy giveaway bill. We debated the bill for 13 days and 6 nights, as I recall. I held down the graveyard shift for 2 nights out of the 6.

We added to that bill, as a result of that debate, a whole series of amendments, not one of which would have been added had we yielded to the steamroller request of the majority leader that afternoon for a vote on the bill before the Members of the Senate even had time to read it.

In my opinion, that was a legitimate use of the filibuster. That was a filibuster which illustrated, again, the blocking of a steamroller and the consuming of enough time to inform the Senate and the Nation of the merits of an issue.

Mr. President, such action does not violate any majority right, because inherent in the doctrine of majority rule is the corollary of the right of the minority to have an opportunity to turn itself into the majority, if it can, by full, fair, and reasonable debate.

But, dedicated though I have been as demonstrated by my record in support of minority rights, I have always proposed in the Senate, in the so-called Morse antifilibuster resolution, a procedure which while protecting the right of the majority to rule, guarantees to the minority the right to fair debate and an opportunity to present its case in an endeavor to change itself from a minority to a majority. I have offered it year after year. Tonight I am going to offer it again for the RECORD. I have no more illusions about its adoption in 1959 than I have had about its adoption in past years. I think it is perfectly clear, however, that there is a growing sentiment in the country for a modification of rule XXII. This is a fairly good indication that those of us—and for many years, now, there have been a large number of us—who have been discussing this matter in the Senate and elsewhere in the country are receiving more and more public support. I believe—although I may be wrong—that a majority of the American people support a majority rule for ending debate in the Senate by imposing cloture—at least, a majority of the people who have taken the time to study the merits of the issue involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the plank of the Democratic Party's platform of 1956 in regard to the matter of proposals for changing the Senate rule with respect to cloture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IMPROVING CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURES

In order that the will of the American people may be expressed upon all legislative proposals, we urge that action be taken at the beginning of the 85th Congress to improve congressional procedures so that majority rule prevails and decisions can be made after reasonable debate without being blocked by a minority in either House.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, a reading of that plank of the Democratic Party's platform of 1956 shows that the Democratic Party, certainly through its platform, supports the principle of majority rule. I am never one to say "Because their political party's convention has adopted a platform, Senators of that party are under obligation to try to put the planks of that platform, without change, into legislation." Of course, all of us know the conditions under which the party platforms are adopted. We know that time does not exist for a thorough consideration of all the minute details which have to be considered or should be considered when we come to the passage of proposed legislation.

But, Mr. President, I do take the position that when a political party pledges itself to a principle of governmental policy, then the elected representatives of that party have an obligation to seek to implement into legislation that principle of policy.

Mr. President, I believe that a proposal such as the one I have previously offered or the proposal of the Humphrey-Douglas-Javits-Case of New Jersey or even the proposal which I understand has been made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] in regard to a three-fifths vote requirement would carry out the objectives of the Democratic Party's political platform. I think my proposal and the Humphrey-Douglas-Javits-Case of New Jersey proposal come much nearer to carrying out the platform.

Be that as it may, tonight I wish to say to my Democratic colleagues that I do not believe they can vote for the Johnson proposal and still carry out the principle of that plank of the Democratic Party's platform of 1956.

I have been heard to say on other occasions, as the other day I said during the conference of liberal Democratic Senators, that if we go along with a compromise which destroys the principle of the Democratic Party's platform plank of 1956, I believe that, come 1960, the voters of the country will impose upon the Democratic Party political consequences which I am afraid most Senators are not envisioning. I say to my Democratic colleagues, it is my view that Senators cannot continue to impose on the Senate a rule which permits of minority rule in the Senate and still maintain the support of the Democratic and the Independent voters and the support of millions of Republican voters in this country.

I happen to think—to talk politics for a moment, Mr. President—that the issue now before the Senate is more pregnant with political implications than I believe many of my Democratic colleagues realize or are willing to admit. Mr. President, I think that in this atomic age the American people are making perfectly clear to the Senate, "Put your house in order, so that the will of the American people, through a majority vote in the Senate, can prevail, or we will elect to the Senate a sufficient number of Senators to change that rule."

In fact, Mr. President, under the auspices of the Democratic National Committee, in the late campaign I campaigned in 16 States. I am advised that I made more speeches in behalf of Democratic candidates for election to the Congress than did any other Democratic Senator who himself was not then a candidate for office. And tonight I testify on the floor of the Senate that, in my judgment, in the States in which I campaigned, there is a great public undercurrent of support for a change of the rules of the Senate, so that majority opinion can prevail in the Senate.

Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing to take that issue into any of the States in which I campaigned, with any Democratic Senator from any of those States, and debate it with him before his constituents, to let them render the verdict, because I am satisfied that American democracy is making very clear to the Senate that American democracy wants to prevail in the Senate the historic principle of majority-rule government which has been referred to in the quotations given tonight from the Federalist Papers.

Mr. President, to that end I have submitted a resolution, which in the last session of Congress was known as Senate Resolution 21. That resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to cloture, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"If at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or VI or any other rule of the Senate, a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

" 'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of those voting, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same; except that any Senator may yield to any other Senator all or any part of the aggregate period of time which he is entitled to speak; and the Senator to whom he so yields may speak for the time so yielded in addition to any period of time which he is entitled to speak in his own right. It shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of such rule is hereby repealed.

Mr. President, I send to the desk this resolution, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed and lie on the table for future reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 6) was received and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection 2 of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to cloture, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"If at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule III or VI or any other rule of the Senate, a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, is presented to the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and 1 hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Presiding Officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question:

" 'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a majority vote of those voting, then said measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

"Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than 1 hour on the measure, motion, or other matter pending before the Senate, or the unfinished business, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same; except that any Senator may yield to any other Senator all or any part of the aggregate period of time which he is entitled to speak; and the Senator to whom he so yields may speak for the time so yielded in addition to any period of time which he is entitled to speak in his own right. It shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate."

SEC. 2. Subsection 3 of such rule is hereby repealed.

Mr. MORSE. Now, Mr. President, I wish to discuss the procedures of that resolution for a moment, because it carries out, I think, as clearly as the English language permits, a guarantee that the rights of a minority of the Senate in debate will be protected in all respects to which a minority is entitled. It guarantees, Mr. President, that the same rule for applying a cloture petition shall prevail; namely, there must be signatures of 16 Senators before cloture can be filed. They are not easy to get. Every Member of this body knows this to be so. Every Senator knows that there is a great hesitancy on the part of each one of us ever to sign a cloture petition until each one of us is convinced that there is really a filibuster under way, and that the filibuster seeks to impose the will of a minority upon the rights of a majority.

But under my resolution, Mr. President, after the cloture petition has been filed—in other words, after 16 Members of the Senate have said, "We think we ought to start procedure for the ending of debate"—it does not mean debate will automatically end. The resolution provides first for the period of time that is necessary for the cloture petition itself to remain at the desk. Then, second, it provides, after a vote has been taken—and it is a majority vote of those present and voting; it is a majority vote of a quorum if only a quorum is present—that each Senator has a right to speak for 1 hour on the merits of the issue and on the merits, as the resolution provides, of amendments which may be before the Senate for consideration in connection with the issue, which amendments had already been submitted and had been at the desk prior to the vote to end debate.

Simple arithmetic shows that theoretically the debate could last for 96 hours. It would not. We all know it would not. It would vary in the case of different issues. In fact, I think with the adoption of my antifilibuster resolution, probably it would be years before it would ever be necessary to apply it. I think the resolution itself, once adopted, would make perfectly clear the foolishness of an attempt at a filibuster which would seek to prevent a vote from ever occurring.

I say that, Mr. President, because the advantage of such a resolution as mine is that it provides for the fixing of a date certain for final vote. That date certainly would be a variable one, depending on how much time Senators used in debate on the merits. It will be noticed I provide that a Senator who does not want to use his time may, if he cares to, farm it out to other Senators. We all know, under the custom of courtesy in the Senate, ordinarily, in a hypothetical situation in which Senator X had no opportunity to use his hour, Senator Y, even though he was on the other side of the issue, would ask Senator X, "Senator, can I have a part or all of your hour?" He would almost automatically, as a matter of courtesy, get an answer such as this, "Well, Senator, I do not know whether I am going to use all my time, but I doubt that I shall use my whole hour. I will tell you what I will do. I will give you 30 minutes now. If you need any more, come back and ask me." Or the Senator would say, "I am not going to use any of my time. Take it."

Speaking hypothetically, if we should be in such a situation that cloture was imposed, the time provision of my resolution would guarantee, in my judgment, adequate opportunity for debate on the merits, so far as a minority is concerned.

That is all I am interested in. I respectfully submit that, in my opinion, this is all any other Senator should be interested in on this issue. I think it is our duty to adopt a procedure that protects the minority right to full and fair debate on the merits of a question, but certainly not the right to thwart the will of the majority to prevent a vote from ever occurring.

The Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case proposal is somewhat similar. It is sufficiently similar, in my judgment, that I shall have no hesitancy in supporting it. In effect, with some variations as to the time element, it accomplishes the same purpose. It provides that the majority vote requirement shall not be imposed unless or until the debate has proceeded for 15 days.

In other words, for the first 15 days a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting would prevail, but after 15 days a majority vote would prevail. This is a very reasonable approximation of the objective which I have in mind in the resolution I have submitted for many years in the Senate. My proposal is from the very beginning for the straight majority-vote principle with respect to cloture. The other proposal recognizes a sort of compromise approach, a two-thirds vote requirement for 15 days and a majority vote requirement thereafter. I am willing to vote for the proposal.

I prefer my own suggestion, but I think this is a very good compromise of differences of opinion within the liberal group in the Senate. Whenever I am satisfied a conscionable compromise has been offered me, I will compromise in the legislative process, because a concionable compromise never involves a compromise of principle.

I try to understand the point of view that a minority ought to be allowed to block legislation from passing. Try hard as I can, I cannot reconcile it with constitutional history, I cannot reconcile it with logic, and I cannot reconcile it with simple fair play in the conduct of a parliamentary body such as the Senate of the United States. I certainly cannot accept it on the basis of the argument which so many of my good friends from the South use in support of a filibuster which permits the preventing of a vote from ever occurring on an issue, on the ground that it is a part of our system of checks and balances. This point of view has been developed from one degree to another in some of the recent columns in our newspapers by columnists for whom I have an exceptionally high regard and opinion, but who, in my judgment, on this particular matter have not done their bookwork, either.

The phrase "checks and balances" is used very loosely in the debates in the Senate. Our system of checks and balances is very complex and complicated running through all branches of the Government. Interestingly enough, a check exercised within one branch frequently and in fact usually has influences upon the actions of other branches.

Let us take a look at the system of checks and balances so frequently referred to in the Senate debate. It is said, "We must protect the American people from a runaway majority." What protection do the people have under a majority-vote rule? First, there is the action of the House of Representatives in the many instances in which a bill first arises in the House. If the bill first arises in the Senate and is passed, it will subsequently come up in the House of Representatives. Is there any one among us who really thinks that the House of Representatives rubberstamps the actions of the Senate of the United States?

I quoted from the Federalist papers in my speech tonight. There is no question about what our Constitutional Fathers intended when they established the two Houses. They told us in the quotations I cited what they intended. They made perfectly clear that the idea was for one House to check the other, but by the exercise of the principle of majority vote. We have that check.

Mr. President, we have many other checks within our own body, the Senate. We have the check of the committee hearings. Every one of us knows what an important check such hearings are. Through the committee hearings we have the check of the people themselves, as they make known through the hearings varying points of view and public opinion with respect to a given proposal. That is an extremely important check which protects the minority.

Certainly a minority cannot take the position, with any logic, that the operations of a Senate committee, which functions as the medium of the petitions of the people of this Nation as they come through representatives and spokesmen to testify before it, endanger minorities. To the contrary, that procedure itself is a great protection to minorities.

I said earlier I would comment on a principle which I respectfully say is being lost sight of in this debate, although I consider it to be one of the controlling principles which ought to be recognized when coming to a vote upon the specific issue before us. I refer to the substantive legislative rights of the American people, which are determined in no small measure by the procedural rights in the Senate of the United States and likewise, of course, those in the House of Representatives. Because of that very elementary principle, but nevertheless one of great importance in the legislative process, the rules of the Senate really do not belong to us. We are simply trustees. I like to look upon the rules of the Senate of the United States as belonging to the American people, because these procedural rules determine in large measure what kind of legislation the people can pass by the efforts of their elected representatives. As elected representatives, I respectfully submit we have no right to defeat the right of our people to majority rule in the Senate of the United States.

The procedures of our committees are very important procedural checks which guarantee to the minority their day, so to speak, in the "legislative court." They help to guarantee that there shall be thorough consideration of a bill on its merits.

But it is asked, "Senator, what are you going to do with a galloping committee? What are you going to do if you have a committee which is controlled by a majority which betrays its trust to see to it that the check of a legislative committee hearing is exercised?" Our check is on the floor of the Senate. It is one of the internal checks of the Senate. We see it operative and exercised week after week and month after month during a session of the Congress.

The questions are raised as to how long the committee hearings were, who testified at the committee hearings, and whether adequate opportunity was given to all to be heard. A committee chairman must stand on the floor and defend the parliamentary course of action of his committee in assuring the Senate that the internal check I am talking about was exercised by his committee.

We have the check of the debate itself, and we have the check of the vote. If the bill pases both Houses, we have the check of the veto by the Executive.

But it is said, "Suppose you are living at a time when, on a particular issue, both Houses of Congress are stampeded, the President is stampeded, and a bill is railroaded through the Congress which is not in the public interest." My answer to this is: "That is a risk of self-government—and thank God for it." It is part of the price of being free. It is one of the privileges of freedom, under rule by the majority, which exists for the American people. I have no intention of sacrificing that principle of freedom for any police state doctrine of rule by the few. I know that what I have just said is not pleasant hearing to some ears, but we cannot escape the conclusion that either we are going to be governed by the majority or we are going to be ruled by the few.

There is one check which I have not yet mentioned, but which I shall mention in a moment. With all these checks, both the majority and the minority are pretty well protected under our legislative process in free America.

But there is still the check of the judiciary. It is not applicable to every legislative case, but I dare say that in most cases which really involve any question of basic governmental rights which are alleged to have been transgressed upon by a runaway Congress or a runaway President, that check is available.

Let us take a look at the judicial history. What a great record the judiciary of America has made over the life span of this Republic, in protecting both the rights of the majority and of the minority.

At a later date, in connection with various proposals to restrict the American judiciary, I intend to present to the Senate a study plan on which I am now working, in defense of the United States Supreme Court and the subsidiary Federal courts in protecting the principles of constitutional rights which all add up to what we refer to as American freedom. I mention the subject tonight only in passing, to point out that the argument of so many of my friends in the Senate that a majority can do such wrong to a minority is another fear argument. It is but another emotional scarecrow appeal being made to frighten the American people into believing that there is something of vital importance in maintaining rule XXII of the Senate in its present form, which permits of what I call legislative blackmail in the operation of the United States Senate.

It has been said in this debate that the threat of a filibuster is no real threat to the passage of legislation by the Senate. It has been said, "Cite an example." I stand before the Senate as a witness to many examples in 14 years in the Senate. Before I cite some of those examples I wish to state my thesis.

The filibuster is a very dangerous parliamentary instrument on the floor of the Senate in defeating needed legislation, and it has been used for that purpose time and time again in the history of the Senate. But the greater danger of the filibuster, the greater injury done by the filibuster, is in the committees of the Senate and in conferences and caucuses of the Senate among its leaders.

I testify that both in committee and in conferences, during my 14 years in the Senate, I have been confronted time and time again with the threat of a filibuster if certain proposed legislation were reported by a committee, or if a group of us in the Senate were to insist upon the passage of legislation without proposed amendments being adopted on the floor of the Senate.

In those 14 years I have seen Members of the Senate yield time and time again to this type of legislative blackmail, although I have protested against it time and again, in committee and in conference. My reply to colleagues in committee who have threatened to filibuster is, "Go ahead and filibuster. I hope there will be enough Senators who will remain in the Chamber day in and day out, and night after night, to break it."

I have never been moved by the threat of a filibuster. I have been saddened by the fact that so frequently in the Senate there has been a surrender to it. I do not believe that on any issue that has substantial public support, any group—South, North, East, or West—can conduct a filibuster beyond 20 days, in these modern times.

I believe that if they tried to do it, and it became clear that the purpose of that filibuster was to prevent the exercise of a majority vote rule in the Senate in the passage of legislation, which in the opinion of the Senate was in the public interest, the great policeman of the Senate, American public opinion, would drive the participants in such a filibuster to the political storm cellars within 20 days. I believe that the uprising of the American public opinion against any group of willful men in the Senate who sought to prevent, by way of the filibuster, the passage of legislation for a period of 20 days would result in such a storm of public protest that those men would soon work out in the Senate a quick agreement for the ending of the filibuster.

The difficulty has been our own. Let us face it. The difficulty has been of our own making. The sad fact is that when filibusters have been started, because the proponents of them could not have their own way either in committee or in party caucus, we have not been willing to stay here tenaciously the clock around until we broke them. In my judgment, in my 14 years in the Senate, there has never been a real, concerted attempt to break a filibuster. There has been a great deal of shadow boxing. There has been a great deal of window dressing. There has been a great deal of going so far only in order to put on a public appearance, and then there has always been a surrender.

It was not so long ago, in 1957, that in the Senate the argument was made to us in party conference after party conference and in bipartisan meetings that if we did not agree to certain amendments to the civil rights bill of 1957 we would be confronted with a filibuster. We were told if we would accept cloakroom agreements concerning certain amendments to the 1957 civil rights bill, southern Senators would not filibuster and we could go home. I know that people do not like to hear me say that, but it happens to be true. Witness after witness in the Senate can be called to so testify.

I spoke out time and time again against what I considered to be legislative blackmail. I refused to vote for that so-called civil-rights bill. I was the only northern Democrat who voted against it. My vote was completely misrepresented by a great many liberals, by liberal organizations and by the press. The false charge was made that I had voted against it because I had made some kind of trade with southern Senators—a complete and unadulterated falsehood—on the Hells Canyon Dam. I said then and I repeat now that no person so saying can produce a southern Senator who will testify that I agreed with him in regard to any trade or understanding in connection with the Hells Canyon Dam issue. What brought us the votes on the Hells Canyon Dam issue, and what caused some Members on the Republican side to change their position, and a great many on this side also, was the unconscionable tax write-off proposal offered to the Idaho Power Co. Their deathbed repentance on the tax writeoff did not change the votes which had already been changed in the Senate, because Senators knew they could change the other way again once the bill was defeated. That is what gave me the votes, in my judgment, which passed the Hells Canyon Dam bill in the Senate.

However, one thing I do wish the RECORD to show. It is that the senior Senator from Oregon entered into no trade and no agreement and no understanding with any southern Senator for his vote in favor of the Hells Canyon Dam. I protest such a reflection on any of my colleagues from the South. My colleagues from the South voted on that bill in accordance with the merits, as they saw them, and in keeping with their judgment.

I voted against the civil rights bill because I disagreed with many of my colleagues in the Senate on its being a good bill. I shall not take the time to review all the reasons why I voted against it, other than to say that if I had no other reason this one would be enough: When title III of the civil rights bill was stricken, so far as I was concerned the heart of the civil rights bill was destroyed.

In the cloak rooms and in the conferences we were told over and over: "You do not have a chance of passing a civil rights bill with title III in it. You will have a filibuster for weeks. If you take out title III, and if you add the jury trial provision"—there were some other proposals made, but I mention these two—"the southern bloc will not filibuster the civil rights bill."

I wish to say this, not because I like to say it, but only because it has been said in debate: "What threat of filibuster has been made on what legislation in the Senate?" That is one. I can mention another one. We had a great contest in the last session of Congress on school legislation, involving Federal aid to education. It went on for weeks. I want the RECORD to show that it was represented to us time and time again in conference and in committee discussions that if those of us who were holding out for a true Federal aid to education bill were not willing to accede to what I considered to be emasculating amendments to a good Federal aid education bill, there would be no education legislation passed. It was held up in committee for weeks. I do not like to say these things. However, I am a witness to the proposition that in my 14 years in the Senate the threat of the filibuster has been the greatest evil of the filibuster.

Mr. President, there has also been in this debate some discussion to the effect that liberals of the past have been inclined to oppose the imposition of cloture. Certainly Senator Lenroot of Wisconsin was never considered a reactionary, and I find, as this table shows, that Senator Lenroot moved to close debate twice.

Senator Johnson, of California, also on one occasion moved to close debate. He was a great liberal. Senators Norbeck, Tyson, and Jones certainly were not conservatives.

The record, I say, simply refutes the argument that all liberals of bygone days used the filibuster as a refuge for protecting minority rights. There is no question that there were great liberals of bygone days, such as the great fighting Bob La Follette, of Wisconsin, who were out-and-out supporters of the unchecked filibuster procedure.

Much proposed legislation, in my judgment, will come out of committee in much better form, so far as the public interest is concerned, with rule XXII changed in order to provide for a straight majority vote, with the safeguards and protection of the minority, which I have previously referred to in this speech.

Mr. President, there are many other phases of this problem which I could discuss, and will if necessary, in my second speech. But I am inclined now to devote the remainder of my remarks to some insertions in the RECORD, in the interest of time. Then, unless I am advised that it would not be in accordance with the pleasure of the leadership of the Senate, I should be glad, after the insertion of these materials, to move, in accordance with the previous understanding, to recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. I announce that as an intention on my part, hoping that the staff will communicate it to the leadership of the Senate and will advise me accordingly, because I have covered the major body of material which I rose to cover.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some material which I first used in 1949, in a rather long speech in the Senate on this same general problem, in which I pointed out that the two-thirds vote requirement of those present and voting, for the period of time which that requirement prevailed in the Senate, had not been successful in imposing cloture on a single civil rights issue. There were some instances in which the two-thirds vote of those present and voting was attained on noncivil rights matters, but there were many times when it was not. I know that some of my southern friends will probably raise their eyebrows in doubt or surprise when I say this. But let me make perfectly clear my position that the filibuster rule which requires either two-thirds of those present and voting or two-thirds of the entire membership, as under the present rule, is not limited to my position on civil rights legislation.

I believe that the filibuster, or the threat of a filibuster, does great damage to the legislative process in relation to a great many economic and social issues other than civil rights issues. But in respect to the civil rights issues, the statistics show that never has the two-thirds vote been attained in order to impose cloture on a civil rights matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD statistical material which I used in 1949, and which has been used again in the brief which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and other Senators have presented on this matter, under the heading "Simple Two-thirds Cloture Won't Stop Filibusters on Civil Rights Bills."

There being no objection, the statistical matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIMPLE TWO-THIRDS CLOTURE WON'T STOP FILIBUSTERS ON CIVIL RIGHTS BILLS

The new rule 22 proposed by Senator JOHNSON provides for cloture by two-thirds of those Senators present and voting, and for the rules of the Senate to continue from one Congress to the next. (S. Res. 30, 85th Cong.)

It is subject to the following objections:

1. Cloture by two-thirds of those present was the rule from 1917–49 and proved unworkable (see Library of Congress summary below);

2. In all of the eight cases of attempted cloture on a civil rights bill, it was impossible to secure a two-thirds vote of those present—although in several cases a heavy majority wanted to proceed to a vote (52–32 and 55–33 on FEPC in 1950);

3. Since attendance now is virtually complete on crucial civil rights issues (93 Senators voted on the 1957 rules issue and again on the jury trial amendment to the civil rights bill in 1957), two-thirds of those present is little different from two-thirds of those elected;

4. To try to make the rules continuing is a transparent attempt, as the first New York Times' report described it, "to make it more difficult to amend the rules in the future," that is, to nullify the explicit Constitutional power upon which the motion to take up Senate rules is based;

5. Walter Lippmann, although he opposes majority rule on controversial issues in the Senate, still conceded (December 25) that "the Johnson proposal is not substantially different from the existing rule."

[1] Many cloture petitions have also been withdrawn or held out of order since 1917.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as every Member of this body knows, no one could have a greater respect for the record of old fighting Bob La Follette than the senior Senator from Oregon. I know of no one in American political history who has influenced my own political philosophy more than has the senior Senator La Follette. But that does not mean that I agreed with every position he took. I did not agree with his position on the filibuster. I did not agree with his position in respect to World War I. But I agreed with his philosophy enough so that in 1924 I campaigned, in speech after speech, in the State of Minnesota for the election of Senator La Follette to the Presidency of the United States.

Mr. President, on March 10, 1949, I spoke at considerable length in the Senate in support of my proposal for the adoption of a rule which would provide for cloture by a majority vote. Because so many of the points which I made in that speech are applicable to the debate this year, and in the interest of not taking the time to restate them or to read the speech, unless at some time in the future it becomes necessary as a parliamentary matter in this debate to do so, I ask unanimous consent that certain excerpts from my speech of March 10, 1949, beginning at page 2142, be printed at this point and made a part of my speech this year.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to support and defend the President of the United States, who I think has made the one and only sound proposal for the elimination from the Senate of the United States of what I consider to be the evil practices of filibuster.

I point out that the President has had a considerable amount of experience in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from Missouri; and on the basis of that experience and on the basis of his experience in the White House, I understand that it is correct—and I do not believe it will be denied—that the President of the United States in recent days has expressed his approval of a reform of the Senate rules for which some of us have been fighting for some time past—a reform which would truly restore to the Senate the principle of majority rule. I understand that the President has expressed himself in favor of the cloture petition or cloture procedure which some of us have been proposing for the past several years; namely, that under certain procedural steps in the Senate of the United States, we shall end debate by the same vote we use in passing major legislation, such as an Economic Cooperation Administration plan or lend-lease; yes, by the same vote rule we follow when we find it necessary to declare war; namely, a majority-vote rule.

I am a little at a loss, to say nothing about being somewhat disappointed, to find a complete retreat, apparently, on the Democratic side of the aisle from the President of the United States, the Democratic leader, insofar as giving to him the support he so justly deserves, in my opinion, for his proposal that we end debate in the Senate of the United States under a cloture rule which will permit of a majority-rule principle. I had hoped that for my antifilibuster resolution, which provides for a majority-vote rule, I would get some Democratic support. I do not want the present Presiding Officer of the Senate or any other Democratic Senator to think for a moment that I am the least bit embarrassed about standing here on the floor of the Senate and defending the President of the United States. On the contrary, I consider it a great privilege and a high honor. I only wish I had some Democrats joining me in defending the President of the United States this afternoon, because I think the President of the United States in his recommendation, which happens to correspond with my own recommendation and resolution, is standing for the only sound procedure which would make it possible for the Senate to operate efficiently and would give voice in the Senate of the United States to the people's business by taking care of it in accordance with what I am satisfied an overwhelming majority of the people think is basic to American democracy; namely, rule by the majority. Yet I understand that my good friend the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lucas], the majority leader, has said, in effect, that on this particular matter he is sorry that he cannot follow his chief. I do not quote him verbatim, of course, but I am sure I correctly quote his meaning, if he has been correctly quoted in the newspapers.

I have just listened to the speech of the Democratic whip, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Myers], who earlier in this session submitted a resolution on cloture which provided for the principle of majority rule, and which differed from my resolution only in one particular. My resolution, as I subsequently perfected it, provided for a majority-vote principle; and, provided that after the adoption of cloture, through a petition filed by 16 Senators—as is the case under the present rule—and after 96 hours of debate would be permitted, each Senator who did not wish to make use of the full hour of debate after cloture—allowed to him by my resolution—would have the right and privilege of farming out his time, if some other Senator wished to take it and add it to the hour which the resolution automatically would provide to each Member of the Senate. I went to the Senator from Pennsylvania and suggested to him that we try to combine our two resolutions. My resolution, when first submitted, as the Presiding Officer will recall, sought to give to each Senator a 2-hour period for debate, after the adoption of cloture, with the farming-out privilege; but I proceeded to make an investigation of the statistics shown in the history of filibusters in the Senate, and I discovered that not even the 96-hour period has ever been used, after cloture. So I decided that the minority would be adequately protected, so far as giving them adequate time to debate the merits of the case, if I changed my proposal so that, instead of providing a 2-hour period, it would provide a 1-hour period, and I so notified the Committee on Rules when I testified before it at the hearings.

At that time it was my understanding the Democratic whip was of opinion the majority-rule principle should prevail, save and except he thought the time should be limited to but 1 hour for each Senator, without the farming-out provision. I suggested to him we combine our two resolutions by my giving up the 2-hour provision and adopting his 1-hour provision, and in turn, by his agreeing to the farming-out provision of my resolution. He was very courteous, as he always is, and in fact, as all my colleagues always are to me and as I try to be to them. He said that under all the circumstances—and I think I quote him accurately—he thought perhaps it would be better if each one of us pressed for his individual resolution. I understood that language. I took it for granted the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania had good reasons, which he was not at the moment discussing with me, for not accepting my compromise proposal; but I did not have the slightest notion that what he had in mind was that at a subsequent date he would further modify his position by adopting a constitutional-majority principle in place of a simple-majority principle. But that is what he subsequently did; and so even the very distinguished and exceedingly able Democratic whip left the President of the United States on this issue and adopted a constitutional-majority principle for his resolution.

I have not been able to find out for a certainty, but it may be I stand here this afternoon as the only Member of the Senate solidly in support of the President on this issue. Be that as it may, if it is true, I am proud of it, because I am satisfied the President is absolutely right in the position he has taken; and I hope I have demonstrated by this time during my service in the Senate that whenever I think the President or any other Democrat is right, I am going to be nonpartisan enough to support him. I take it for granted the people of my State sent me here to support and fight for what I think is right. I am convinced, for reasons I shall hereafter set forth in this speech, that the simple-majority-vote principle for which the President is standing, if I have been correctly informed as to his position, is the absolutely sound way to eliminate the filibuster evil from the Senate.

So I desire to state for the RECORD my reasons in support of the Morse antifilibuster resolution, and I want to reply briefly to some very able, but I think fallacious, arguments which have been made on this issue by some of my distinguished colleagues on the other side.

I agree with the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] this is a momentous debate. I think it is but another chapter in a great fight that is going to continue to be waged in the Senate until the coming of that happy day when the people's will will prevail and a rule in the Senate will be adopted making it possible for the will of the people through a majority vote of their elected representatives to be registered in this august body.

I do not think we are going to win the fight this time. I wish I could be more optimistic about it. But I expect now as in the other rounds of the fight in times gone by, the proponents of an antifilibuster resolution will lose. Why? Because neither party in the Senate, Republican or Democratic, in my opinion, has stood up in the fight and made it clear it is willing to take those steps necessary to win the fight. Thus it must go back to the people, and the people once again are going to have to impress upon more Senators at the ballot boxes their determination to see to it that the fight is won in the Senate, either by getting men now in the Senate, once they come again face to face with the people on this issue in campaigns, to change their thinking on the issue, or by supplanting men already here, at future elections, with other candidates for the Senate, who will come here and make the fight which I think should be made now, and, as I have said on the floor on this issue in times past, which should have been made in previous battles.

We cannot win unless we are willing, as we have not been thus far in the fight, to continue in session for as many days, weeks, and months as may be necessary to demonstrate to the minority that we do not propose to have the majority will trampled by minority tactics in the Senate. It must be done some time; why not now?

I repeat, Mr. President, that the rights of the people in legislation before the Congress of the United States are no better than their procedural rights in the Senate of the United States. So long as the rules of the Senate permit, through a filibuster, the defeat of the will of the great, overwhelming majority of the American people on various issues, then there must be eliminated the procedures which produce such an unconscionable result, if this is to be a truly representative government. To me it is a very simple issue. I am either right or wrong. Mr. President, in saying that the most fundamental tenet of a democratic form of government is that which says the majority will shall prevail, subject to the checks and balances of the Constitution, through a judiciary, and the veto of the President, in case the majority of the Senate and the House pass legislation which cannot be squared with the fundamental constitutional guarantees of the document which gave us all of our rights and liberties.

That is why I never have been able to accept, and cannot now accept, the able arguments of distinguished Democrats on the other side of the aisle, that the Constitution guarantees to them that, under the rules of the Senate, they shall have preserved to them the right to block the majority through procedural tactics, because in their judgment, they do not believe certain legislation which the majority otherwise would pass is constitutional. Mr. President, that defines, in my judgment, our whole theory of government, not only of checks of powers but separation of powers as well.

The American people need to reflect once again on the fact that under our system of government, if we pass legislation which, in fact, is unconstitutional, the courts will pass on it, unless, before it gets to the court, the President of the United States exercises his veto, which, under the Constitution, requires a two-thirds vote to override.

When the Founding Fathers were faced with the problem of establishing the checks in the Constitution they did not have any difficulty in providing a two-thirds vote requirement when they wanted a two-thirds vote requirement as a check. They understood the effect of a two-thirds vote requirement as well as we do; and in the magnificent document which they wrote they checked us, the Senate of the United States, in the passing of unconstitutional legislation, by giving to the President the veto power over us and requiring that his veto shall stand unless a two-thirds vote of the Senate, as well as of the House, overrides it. But they did not anywhere in that document provide that the debate in the Senate of the United States shall be unlimited in the sense that a handful, a minority, of Senators can organize and block the will of the majority by preventing a vote ever occurring on a piece of legislation. If they wanted to place that power in any minority group in the Senate, the English language was perfectly capable of being so used. But they did not do it. What did they provide? They provided that the House and the Senate shall be allowed to make their own rules governing procedure.

In the speech of the Senator from Georgia, delivered on February 28, 1949, he said, at page 1606 of the RECORD, that had someone suggested a limitation on debate in a conference of the States, before the formation of the Constitution, it would have dissolved the conference.

The Senator from Georgia can assert it, but it is an assumption, which, in my judgment, does not rest upon historical probability. Why do I say that? Because, Mr. President, the Continental Congress, which preceded these great constitutional debates, operated on the basis of a rule which permitted of the previous question. It did not dissolve over that parliamentary practice which limited debate. At the very time the constitutional fathers sat it was the common practice in parliamentary bodies, colonial, and, to the extent we had them, combinations of colonial bodies such as the Continental Congress to use the previous question technique as the device for limiting debate.

I most respectfully say to my good friend from Georgia that I know of no basis in history to support his assumption that had any such proposal been made at the Constitutional Convention to limit debate in the Senate of the United States, the convention would have dissolved. To the contrary, I think the assumption ought to be that, in view of the parliamentary practice which prevailed at that time, by way of the previous question as a device for limiting debate, just the opposite conclusion from that reached by the Senator from Georgia is the one which we should accept.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be very glad to yield for a question.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator not know that the previous question, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, was itself a debatable question, and that it has little relationship to the previous question as now known in the House of Representatives?

Mr. MORSE. I am perfectly aware of that, but I am sure, also, that the Senator from Georgia would agree with me that at the time of the Constitutional Convention, at the time of the Continental Congress, the usages or practices which grew up around the use of the previous question did not fall into the evil way of a filibuster as it has developed on the floor of the Senate. Rather, the fact is that Members voted on the previous question for limiting debate on a majority-vote basis. In other words, the practice was that men who assembled in parliamentary bodies, after full and fair debate on the merits of an issue, recognized the right of the majority eventually to end debate by the previous question.

In defending that right of unlimited debate in the Senate, Senators George and Connally, for example, relate it somehow to State sovereignty, to the sovereignty of the individual State.

Sovereignty means supreme power. The question of the location of sovereign power in the United States is to be answered, not by reference to the political theory of the American Constitution, but by reference to the hard facts of American life. Whatever the original design, the stubborn fact is that supreme power has come to reside in the central government (if it resides anywhere) as a result of the outcome of the War Between the States, the industrial revolution, and the onward march of science and technology. The intellectual edifice of State sovereignty and States rights, with its corollary doctrines of nullification and withdrawal, treating the National Government as the mere agent of associated States, which was elaborated by Calhoun, collapsed with the defeat of the South in the Civil War.

State sovereignty, in a narrow sense, no longer fits the cold hard facts of modern industrial society. It has passed away forever down the irreversible stream of time. Yet it lingers on in the southern mind like the nostalgic echo of a voice that is still. "But, oh, for the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still."

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia, in his very able speech on February 28, said that a right which attaches to the sovereign State is this right of unlimited debate. As I have just said, the Constitution does not say so. Article I, section 5, paragraph 2, of the Constitution provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings. Therefore I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt, certainly no reasonable constitutional doubt, concerning the power of the Senate under the Constitution to adopt a rule regulating debate in this body. If that premise is sound under article I, section 5, paragraph 2, then certainly there is no invasion of sovereign powers of the States under the Constitution for this body to adopt a majority-vote rule, because article I, section 5, paragraph 2, contains no word of limitation on the power of the Senate of the United States to adopt its rules.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, the Senator is familiar with the Constitution, and he recognizes, does he not, that there are some things which cannot be done by the Congress except by the consent of the States, and the one and foremost provision is that no State can be deprived of its equal representation or equal suffrage without its consent?

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. I also call the Senator's attention to another constitutional provision, namely, that there can be no subdivision of a State, or the creation of a new State out of an old State, or the creation of a new State by combination of parts of two States, except by the consent of the States.

Mr. MORSE. That is true.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator would not contend, would he, that by mere rule or regulation those constitutional prohibitions could be written out of the Constitution?

Mr. MORSE. Not at all, but I do contend that the observation just made by the Senator from Georgia is entirely irrelevant to the issue before the Senate, as to whether or not under article I, section 5, paragraph 2, of the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the right to adopt a rule governing debate in the Senate which will provide that a majority vote may limit debate. Such a proposed rule has not the slightest connection with the sovereign right of any State.

Mr. President, of course there are rights given to the States under the Constitution which the Senate of the United States cannot take away from the States, but I cannot go along with what I consider to be a fallacious conclusion in the logic of the Senator from Georgia, that because certain rights of the States are guaranteed to them under the Constitution, there is any connection whatsoever with the grant of rights and powers in article I, section 5, paragraph 2, which specifically reserve to the House of Representatives and the Senate the right to adopt rules governing their proceedings. I most respectfully say that the implication of the argument of the Senator from Georgia is a clear non sequitur.

I say, Mr. President, that the safeguard of States rights is to be found in the equal representation of the States in the Senate, and not in its parliamentary procedure. I repeat, my first answer to the able argument of the Senator from Georgia is that the safeguard of States rights is to be found in the equal representation of the States in the Senate, not in its parliamentary procedure.

The Hayden resolution proposes no change in the voting requirements for the application of cloture, nor any reduction in the time allowance for debate following the vote on the cloture motion. No apprehension of the impairment of the rights of the States was voiced in the debate preceding the adoption of the existing cloture rule in 1917, for which all the southern Democratic Senators voted on that memorable day. Were State rights jeopardized during the 5-year period from 1917 to 1922, before the first breach in the ramparts of the present rule was found by a Presiding Officer? The States rights argument in this connection, I say most respectfully, Mr. President, is unsound, and designed to catch timid and unwary souls.

Mr. President, let us consider what an examination of the facts shows about the debates which occurred in 1917 at the time the present cloture rule was adopted.

The date was March 8, 1917. The debate consumed 6 hours, or 26 pages of the RECORD. Of the Senators who participated in the debate, six expressed their preference for majority rather than two-thirds cloture. They were:

Hollis, of New Hampshire, whose comments appear on pages 26 and 27 of the RECORD for March 8, 1917.

Norris, of Nebraska, whose comments in support of majority rule appear on pages 27 and 28 of the RECORD for that date.

Stone, of Missouri, whose support of majority rule cloture appears on page 31.

Owen, of Oklahoma, whose comments appear on page 32.

Thomas, of Colorado. Read his support of majority rule on page 33.

Vardaman, of Mississippi. Note his comment on page 39.

Senator Stone on that occasion prophesied that the two-thirds cloture rule would prove ineffective, and I venture in my humble way to prophesy this afternoon that, even with the adoption of the Hayden resolution, we will not solve the filibuster problem in the Senate, and we will never solve it until we adopt the majority-vote principle in this body.

On March 8, 1917, Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, stated that at least 40 Senators then favored majority cloture, but were bound by a gentlemen's agreement to vote for a two-thirds rule. It is my understanding that what happened behind the scenes in 1917 was that some 40 Senators expressed preference for a simple majority-vote rule in the Senate of the United States for limiting debate, but the leadership prevailed upon them, as so often happens in the Senate now, to modify their views or compromise their position by going along with a two-thirds vote rather than the majority vote which they preferred. It was that understanding and that arrangement which I assume Senator Owen was referring to when on March 8, 1917, he said that at least 40 Senators then favored majority cloture, but were bound by a gentlemen's agreement to vote for the two-thirds rule.

The RECORD shows, Mr. President, that Senator Thomas, of Colorado, on that day said:

"The principle of majority rule is an established and essential principle in American government from the Nation to its smallest hamlet. The majority should have and exercise the power of determining what its policy will be not only with regard to legislation, but, as well, the methods by which legislation is to be accomplished. Two-thirds cloture," he said, "will bring no real measure of relief. It will provide a delusion and a snare. Unless the rules be amended by providing cloture by majority the practical operation of this amendment will prove a deep disappointment to the hopes of its sponsors."

If prophetic words were ever uttered in the Senate of the United States, Mr. President, on March 8, 1917, Senator Thomas, of Colorado, uttered them in connection with the quotation from his speech I have just read to the Senate, because I think it is perfectly clear that the two-thirds vote rule in regard to cloture has proved to be a delusion and a snare.

On that same historic day, the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Vardaman, stated that he recognized that unlimited debate has served the people of the South—

"But"—

He added—

"I would prefer that the rule would provide for the invocation of the cloture by a majority rather than by a two-thirds vote."

Mr. President, the two-thirds cloture rule was adopted on March 8, 1917, by a vote of 76 to 3. Of the 16 Senators not voting, it was announced that 11 would have voted "Yea." Thus, at least 87 of the 96 Senators then favored a limitation of debate in the Senate of the United States. Where were the southern protests on that day when the sovereignty of the States was being invaded? Where were the southern protests on that day that a great constitutional safeguard was being destroyed in the Senate of the United States? Southern Senators on that day voted for the rule. I think it is also quite obvious that they voted for the rule, thinking, as was the practice for the 5 years thereafter, that it applies to all matters of business before the Senate, be it a motion to take up a bill, or to approve the Journal, or to consider a measure in the sense of the subsequent interpretation of the word "measure" being limited, as the Presiding Officer 5 years later ruled, to a pending bill.

No; I am not impressed, Mr. President, with the argument that the sovereignty of the States is being invaded by putting into application the simple majority-vote principle in the Senate of the United States so that we can transact the people's business and protect the people from the obstructionist tactics of men who seek to talk a bill to death so that no vote can ever occur on it.

I repeat now what I think I have said before on the floor of the Senate—I certainly have said it in committee—that there is all the difference in the world between a prolonged debate on the merits of an issue and a prolonged debate that is intended to continue until such time as the majority yields to an agreement or understanding that no vote on the measure at all shall take place, but, rather, that the majority shall surrender to the minority and the proposed legislation shall be laid on the table or be withdrawn. That has happened since I have been in the Senate, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is filled with many instances of its happening before I came to the Senate. I say that that type of prolonged debate in the Senate of the United States defeats what I consider to be one of the fundamental purposes and principles of democratic government—majority rule.

Not only that, but let it be understood that one of the most costly prices we pay for the filibuster tactics in the Senate of the United States is in committee—not on the floor of the Senate, but in committee. The American people, I am sure, are not fully aware of the fact that the threat of the filibuster is a common weapon that profilibusterers use frequently in committee, where, after a committee by a clear majority is of one mind as to what kind of legislation should be recommended to the floor of the Senate, a minority of the committee will say, in effect, "If you vote the bill out in that form, we warn you we will talk it to death on the floor of the Senate." I call that parliamentary intimidation and, in my judgment, it is used too often in the Senate of the United States, with the result that too frequently committees bring to the floor of the Senate, not legislation by way of recommendation which corresponds to their real desires as a majority; not legislation which the majority of the committee thinks would be in the public interest; but legislation which has been whiplashed out of them by way of a threat of a filibuster if they do not yield in committee to the will of the minority.

Mr. President, if I had to state what I think is the greatest evil in the filibuster, I would not mention first the tremendous waste of time and expense involved in holding up the people's business on the floor of the Senate in actual debate, bad as I think that is. I should say that the great cost of the rule which permits a filibuster is paid in committee, in executive sessions of the committee, away from the public view, where the public is not aware of what is going on behind committee doors. We are confronted there with the threat that if we do not yield to the whiplash of the minority by writing into the bill provisions which we do not think ought to be in the bill, we either cannot get a bill at all, or if we get it to the floor of the Senate, the minority will talk it to death, to use the exact phrase which I have heard on several occasions in committees of which I have been a member since I have been in the Senate.

That is not good government. I do not think it is democratic government. Thus I repeat that I am proud to stand here today shoulder to shoulder with Harry S. Truman in support of a principle of good government which I think in some way, somehow, we must make prevail in America—that the Senate of the United States shall operate and function on the basis of a majority vote principle. My invitation is an open one, and will continue to be extended over the months and years ahead, so long as I am in the Senate, for Democrats and Republicans alike to join with me in support of President Truman on this issue, because he is right.

Returning to the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], in this very able argument he said, on February 28:

"We can have absolutism in a legislative body. We can bring about absolutism in the Congress by a gag rule."

Mr. President, absolutism means despotism. Absolutism is the doctrine or practice of unlimited authority and control. I repeat that there are ample limits upon public authority in our constitutional system of checks and balances; but unlimited debate in the Senate has never been a part of American political theory.

I quote from the scholarly book by W. F. Willoughby, "Principles of Legislative Organization and Administration," published in 1934. I read excerpts from pages 495 and 499. In that book Willoughby says:

"The real issue involved in obstruction in the Senate is simply this: Shall majority rule and responsible party government prevail? Impartial students of the question have concluded that it is desirable that the Senate should provide by its rules for greater freedom of debate than obtains in the House, but that it should at the same time provide means by which an abuse of this freedom may be prevented. * * * Obstruction which goes beyond that of legitimate debate is an evil that should be brought under control, both because it consumes the time of the Chamber and because it places undue obstacles in the way of proper working of party government. * * * As in all cases where power is granted, the opportunity for its abuse exists and * * * reasonable safeguards against such abuse should be provided. Such safeguards, however, should not go as far as to enable the minority, in an open contest, to make its will prevail over the majority. While a majority can use its powers in an illegitimate way, the same is true of the minority; and as between the two, the former * * * is the lesser evil."

Mr. President, I fail to see any basis in merit for the fear of the Senator from Georgia that the adoption even of a majority-vote rule in the Senate of the United States would run any danger whatsoever of absolutism. The Senator from Georgia was speaking of the Hayden resolution. I am sure that he would deplore even more my resolution. However, even under my resolution, I do not see any basis for the fear which he has expressed, if we constantly keep in mind the other checks against a majority which might seek to abuse its powers, as suggested by Mr. Willoughby in the book from which I have quoted; if we keep constantly in mind the veto power of the President, the two-thirds vote under the Constitution in regard to overriding the veto, and the great judicial safeguards of the United States Supreme Court in protecting constitutional rights both of individuals and of States.

That leads me to repeat for the RECORD the protection to minority rights contained in the resolution for which I am fighting and which adopts majority-vote-rule principle. It has been suggested in the course of this debate—in fact, in the committee the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] suggested it—that if we adopt a majority-vote principle in a resolution which provides for 96 hours of debate, as my resolution does, and which accords to each Senator the right to farm out his time, as my resolution does, there is nothing thereafter which would stop the Senate from further modifying such a rule so as to reduce the 96 hours to 48, the 48 to 24, the 24 to 12, the 12 to 6, or to use the argument of reducing it to an absurdity, wiping out entirely—so those who fear that danger say—any right to debate after cloture has been adopted.

I know that reducing things to an absurdity is frequently a very effective technique when someone wishes to argue from fear rather than from the realities. I believe that those who make that argument fly in the face of the realities of practice of the Senate. Why do I say that? I say it because, as I shall show later by certain statistics which I shall offer, it is most difficult to get 16 Members of the Senate to sign a cloture petition in the first instance. They are not going to do it, and they do not do it, unless and until they become convinced that there is in progress a filibuster which seeks to prevent a vote from ever occurring on an issue.

After the petition is signed, there is another safeguard reality. Those who employ the fear argument tell us that there is a danger that a majority may subsequently further modify the rule or overlook it. The safeguard is that after 16 Members have signed a cloture petition, under my resolution it would require a majority of the Members of the Senate to apply cloture. Has that happened very frequently? In the cases in which cloture petitions have been filed, we find that out of 19 times when such a petition was filed, it was possible to get a majority vote only 12 times. Incidentally, it was possible to get a two-thirds vote only four times. That is why I say that the proposal which is being offered here for a two-thirds vote is ineffective. Statistically it is shown to be little more than a gesture. A two-thirds vote was obtained only 4 times out of 19, and a majority vote 12 times out of 19. So it is evident that a majority of the Members of the Senate will hesitate a long time before they stop their colleagues from discussing the merits of an issue, unless they are convinced that the minority have organized in an endeavor to prevent the majority from even voting. Then I say it is proper for the Senate rule to vest in the majority the right to vote, as provided in my resolution. Although there are some Members of the Senate who seem to think that this type of a practical check in the Senate is not effective, I think the matter of fair play in the Senate and the matter of senatorial courtesy is one of the very practical safeguards protecting the minority from any steamroller tactics which those who have protested my use of the so-called senatorial courtesy argument seem to fear. History supports me, Mr. President, for the statistics which I shall shortly present show that the majority is very hesitant, as it should be, to apply any gag upon the minority, save and except in instances when it is satisfied that the minority is seeking to deny to the majority its democratic right to reach a vote on the issue in question.

So I say that when we examine the realities of Senate practices, the fear arguments, which are being advanced by the opponents of my resolution providing for a majority-vote rule, deserve very little weight.

But the Senator from Georgia apparently feels that there is a great danger of this, because in his speech on February 28 he said:

"Senate Resolution 15 is a grant of power which ultimately will be used to perpetuate a great wrong."

Mr. President, I do not share that opinion. I do not agree with the Senator from Georgia that Senate Resolution 15 is a grant of power. I say it is naught but a rule of procedure prescribing the conditions under which debate may be closed. It can be successfully invoked, under the Hayden resolution, only if two-thirds of the Senators present vote in favor of it. Two-thirds of the Senate will not perpetrate any great wrong upon the American people; in fact, the statistics show that, on the average, 83 Senators have voted on each of the 19 cloture petitions or motions which have been submitted since 1917. We see, therefore, that when a cloture fight arises in the Senate, and when the time comes for voting on that question, there are not very many empty seats in the Senate Chamber. The record shows that to be so. I repeat that, on the average, 83 Senators have been in their seats at the time of the vote on 19 different occasions since 1917 when cloture petitions have been filed and the question of invoking cloture has been voted on.

Mr. President, cloture does not take away any part, I submit, of the right of the smaller States of the Union to have their say in regard to what they wish to say.

In his speech on February 28 the Senator from Georgia also said, "The smallest State in this Union * * * can say what it wishes to say."

I agree with the Senator from Georgia, but I deny his conclusion that Senate Resolution 15 will in any way take away that right. There will be ample opportunity for every State, large or small, to be heard upon the merits of a question, under Senate Resolution 15 or under my resolution providing for cloture by majority vote, if you will, Mr. President, both during the pre-petition stage, during the 2-day interval between the filing of the cloture petition and the vote on it, and during the 96 hours of potential debate after cloture has been adopted, if it is adopted. Under those procedural steps, I ask, can one really imagine a situation in the Senate of the United States in which the smaller States will not have ample opportunity or time to have their say, and all they want to say, on the merits of any issue pending before the Senate of the United States? Let us keep in mind, first, the reluctance of any 16 Members of the Senate to file a cloture petition unless they are convinced that a filibuster has started—which means that prior to that moment there has been adequate and ample time for debate on the merits of the issue in question—and, second, the fact that after the filing of the petition there is a 2-day interval which permits of two continuous days of debate on the merits of the issue involved in the cloture petition; and the further fact that after the adoption of cloture, if it is adopted, 96 hours of debate are permitted under the Hayden amendment, if each Senator wishes to use his hour, to discuss the merits of the issue; and the further fact that under my resolution 96 hours of debate is permitted, with the farming-out privilege, which I think is an additional safeguard to minority interests in the Senate—which I, too, wish to protect; I simply do not wish to give the minority the right to trample the majority underfoot. That is the difference. I do not wish to give to the minority the right to deny effectively to the majority the right to pass proposed legislation, which the present rule permits the minority to do.

No, Mr. President; the talk about taking away from the smaller States their right to say what they wish to say on an issue is a fear argument. It simply will not work out that way in practice. It does not work out that way in practice and I submit it cannot work out that way in practice. My proposal does give—and its great merit is to be found in its strength—to the majority in the Senate the right to prevent any minority group of Senators from denying to the majority the right finally to pass proposed legislation.

My good friend the Senator from Georgia said on February 28:

"If a man's soul recoils from such a proposition as that, is he not justified in saying that, so long as he can prevent it, it shall not even be submitted to the Congress of the United States for decision?"

My answer to him is that I do not think such a right should be recognized under the rules of the Senate of the United States, because I believe such a claimed right, if allowed to be exercised, is equivalent to a license to defeat a fundamental tenet of democratic government, namely, the will of the majority. For one Senator or a minority of Senators to refuse to permit the Senate to vote upon a proposition, simply because the minority believe it is unconstitutional or is contrary to some sectional interest, in my judgment is an arrogant substitution by the minority of their judgment for that of the entire Senate and of the courts of the land. The final arbiters of the civil rights and liberties of the American people are and should be the courts, not transient minorities in the Senate of the United States, whose Members may come from only one section of the country or from only one political party, and none of whom may have been elected recently. The fifth amendment to the Constitution did not enact Herbert Spencer's proposed social station. Neither should rule XXII enable a handful of Senators to prevent consideration of legislation passed by the House of Representatives and desired by an overwhelming majority of the American people.

Let me say a word about the interesting question of political science and political ethics, as to just whom we represent in the Senate. Reasonable men may differ, as they differ on the point I now make; but so far as I am concerned it is a crystal-clear dictate that I feel was vested in me when the people of my State sent me to the Senate. They did not send me to the Senate from Oregon for Oregon. They sent me under our representative system of government from Oregon for the Nation; not to sit here and vote a blind partisan sectional interest on any piece of legislation. Great as the temptation sometimes is to vote and act in that way, weak and inclined as some of us at times may be to yield to the temptation, if and when we do, I say, in my judgment, we do not measure up to the great trust the people of our States placed in us when they sent us to the Senate.

I look upon the Senate as a part of our representative government, as a part of a legislative government, I may say to my good friend from Georgia, as a part of one of the legislative branches of the Government, sent here to legislate in the interests of all the people from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. The people of Oregon did not send me here as an ambassador from Oregon. I thought we answered and found the solution to that issue, terrible as it was, costly as it was, in the War Between the States. I thought as the outcome of that war the notion of Calhoun that we sat here as ambassadors from our respective States was repudiated, and that from that time on we were to sit in the Senate, not as ambassadors from particular States, fighting for the selfish sectional interests, economic, political, and social, of various sections of the country, but fighting for the welfare of the Nation. At least it is in that spirit I propose to stand always on the floor of the Senate and fight as a representative in the Senate from the great State of Oregon, believing that by so doing I am carrying out the great principle of representation to which I pledged myself when I took the oath at the Presiding Officer's desk when I first came into the Senate.

to support and defend the Constitution—which means all the rights set forth in the Constitution for the benefit of the whole Nation—and to pass legislation, if necessary, to see to it that millions of people in this country who may not be getting the full fruits of their constitutional rights as set forth in the letter of the Constitution shall be able to live in terms of those rights. That is my conception of my duty of representation in the Senate. I am perfectly aware of the fact, as I read the able speech of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, delivered on February 28, that he has a considerably different notion as to what representation in the Senate imposes upon him by way of duties and rights and obligations.

Since I have come to the Senate I have been saddened several times because I felt on both sides of the aisle alinements were formed on the basis of selfish sectional interests on various economic and social problems before the Senate for consideration. I know the pressure to do that is great, and I know that sometimes when one does not yield to the pressure his failure to do so may be at great cost to his own political fortunes. I have been able to practice it thus far, and I pray I shall have the strength and the courage to continue to practice it on specific issues; namely, that whenever I am satisfied a vote for a measure that would be of great benefit to my State would not at the same time be in the public interest, I intend to vote against the measure.

Mr. President, I ask to have incorporated as a part of my remarks at this point this list of filibusters in the Senate for the years mentioned, as set forth on pages 17 to 19 of the Galloway pamphlet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"OUTSTANDING SENATE FILIBUSTERS FROM 1841 TO 1948

"1841: A bill to remove the Senate printers was filibustered against for 10 days. A bill relating to the Bank of the United States was filibustered for several weeks and caused Clay to introduce his cloture resolution.

"1846: The Oregon bill was filibustered for 2 months.

"1863: A bill to suspend the writ of habeas corpus was filibustered.

"1876: An Army appropriation bill was filibustered against for 12 days, forcing the abandonment of a rider which would have suspended existing election laws.

"1880: A measure to reorganize the Senate was filibustered from March 24 to May 16 by an evenly divided Senate, until two Senators resigned, giving the Democrats a majority.

"1890: The Blair education bill was filibustered. The force bill, providing for Federal supervision of elections, was successfully filibustered for 29 days. This resulted in the cloture resolution introduced by Senator Aldrich which was also filibustered and the resolution failed.

"1893: An unsuccessful filibuster lasting 42 days was organized against a bill for the repeal of the Silver Purchase Act.

"1901: Senator Carter successfully filibustered a river-and-harbor bill because it failed to include certain additional appropriations.

"1902: There was a successful filibuster against the tri-State bill proposing to admit Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to statehood, because the measure did not include all of Indian Territory according to the original boundaries.

"1903: Senator Tillman, of North Carolina, filibustered against a deficiency appropriation bill because it failed to include an item paying his State a war claim. The item was finally replaced in the bill.

"1907: Senator Stone filibustered against a ship-subsidy bill.

"1908: Senator La Follette led a filibuster lasting 28 days against the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency currency law. The filibuster finally failed.

"1911: Senator Owen filibustered a bill proposing to admit New Mexico and Arizona to statehood. The House had accepted New Mexico, but refused Arizona because of her proposed constitution. Senator Owen filibustered against the admission of New Mexico until Arizona was replaced in the measure. The Canadian reciprocity bill passed the House and failed through a filibuster in the Senate. It passed Congress in an extraordinary session but Canada refused to accept the proposition.

"1913: A filibuster was made against the omnibus public building bill by Senator Stone, of Missouri, until certain appropriations for his State were included.

"1914: Senator Burton, of Ohio, filibustered against a river and harbor bill for 12 hours. Senator Gronna filibustered against acceptance of a conference report on an Indian appropriation bill. In this year also the following bills were debated at great length, but finally passed: Panama Canal tolls bill, 30 days; Federal Trade Commission bill, 30 days; Clayton amendments to the Sherman Act, 21 days; conference report on the Clayton bill, 9 days.

"1915: A filibuster was organized against President Wilson's ship-purchase bill by which German ships in American ports would have been purchased. The filibuster was successful and as a result three important appropriation bills failed.

"1917: The armed-ship bill of President Wilson was successfully filibustered, and caused the defeat of many administration measures. This caused the adoption of the Martin resolution embodying the President's recommendation for a change in the Senate rules, on limitation of debate.

"1919: A filibuster was successful against an oil and mineral leasing bill, causing the failure of several important appropriation bills and necessitating an extraordinary session of Congress.

"1921: The emergency tariff bill was filibustered against in January 1921, which led Senator Penrose to present a cloture petition. The cloture petition failed, but the tariff bill finally passed.

"1922: The Dyer antilynching bill was successfully filibustered against by a group of southern Senators.

"1923: President Harding's ship-subsidy bill was defeated by a filibuster.

"1925: Senator Copeland (New York) talked at length against ratification of the Isle of Pines Treaty with Cuba, but the treaty was finally ratified.

"1926: A 10-day filibuster against the World Court Protocol was ended by a cloture vote of 68 to 26, the second time cloture was adopted by the Senate. A bill for migratory bird refuges was talked to death by States rights advocates in the spring of 1926, a motion for cloture failing by a vote of 46 to 33.

"1927: Cloture again failed of adoption in 1927 when it was rejected by 32 yeas against 59 nays as a device to end obstruction against the Swing-Johnson bill for development of the lower Colorado River Basin.

"One of the fiercest filibusters in recent decades succeeded in March 1927 in preventing an extension of the life of a special campaign investigating committee headed by James A. Reed, of Missouri. The committee's exposé of corruption in the 1926 senatorial election victories of Frank L. Smith in Illinois and of William S. Vare in Pennsylvania had aroused the ire of a few Senators who refused to permit the continuance of the investigation despite the wishes of a clear majority of the Senate.

"1933: Early in 1933 a 2-week filibuster was staged against the Glass branch-banking bill in which Huey Long first participated as a leading figure. 'Senators found him impervious to sarcasm and no man could silence him.' Cloture was defeated by the margin of a single vote. Finally, the filibuster was abandoned and the bill passed.

"1935: The most celebrated of the Long filibusters was staged on June 12–13, 1935. Senator Long spoke for 15½ hours, a feat of physical endurance never excelled in the Senate, in favor of the Gore amendment to the proposed extension of the National Industrial Recovery Act. But the amendment was finally tabled.

"1938: A 29-day "feather duster" filibuster in January-February 1938 defeated passage of a Federal antilynching bill, although an overwhelming majority of the Senate clearly favored the bill.

"1939: An extended filibuster against adoption of a monetary bill, extending Presidential authority to alter the value of the dollar, continued from June 20 to July 5, 1939, but finally failed by a narrow margin.

"1942, 1944, 1946, 1948: Four organized filibusters upon the perennial question of Federal anti-poll-tax legislation were successful in these years. An attempt to pass fair employment practice legislation in 1946 was also killed by a filibuster. The present Senate cloture rule proved ineffective in these cases as a device for breaking filibusters.

"LIMITATION OF DEBATE IN STATE LEGISLATURES

"Examination of the rules of procedure in effect in the several State legislatures indicates that four major approaches are followed in an effort to limit debate. These are: (1) limitation on the number of times a member may speak to any single question; (2) limitation on the length of time a member may speak; (3) use of the previous-question motion to cut off debate; and (4) special forms of cloture.

"1. Limitation on number of times a member may speak: With but isolated exceptions the rules of State senates and houses of representatives alike limit the number of times any member may speak on a single question at a single stage in procedure. The number specified is commonly twice, with a proviso that a member may not even speak the second time until all who desire to speak once have done so. Exceptions are, however, commonly made in favor of committee chairmen, bill sponsors, etc.

"2. Duration of normally permitted debate: About half of the legislative chambers go further and specify that, at least on a given day or at a given stage in procedure, a member may not speak in excess of a limited period of time without unanimous consent or other permission. Periods as short as 5 to 10 minutes are found (Oklahoma House and Senate, respectively); a 30-minute limitation is common; while 1-hour (Alabama Senate and Arizona House) and 2-hour specifications (South Carolina and Colorado Senates) are also found. In some instances there are even more restrictive time limits in force for debate on special subjects, e.g., questions of privilege.

"3. Previous question: Most State legislatures specifically permit use of the motion for the previous question as a device for cutting off debate, and word their rules so as to facilitate its use. Only two legislative chambers (the Senates of Utah and Vermont) are known to forbid the motion.

"4. Other forms of cloture: In view of the frequency of provisions of the above types it is obvious that the State legislatures do not have any great need for other forms of cloture. The following are some examples of those special cloture rules known to exist.

New York Senate, rule XIV, section 1, paragraphs 3 and 4:

"'When any bill, resolution, or motion shall have been under consideration for 2 hours, it shall be in order for any senator to move to close debate, and the president shall recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put, and if it shall receive the affirmative vote of a majority of the senators present, the pending measure shall take precedence over all other business.

" 'The vote shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, resolution, or motion with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such motion, according to the rules of the senate, but without further debate, except that any senator who may desire to do so shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding 5 minutes; upon the rollcall any senator may speak not to exceed 5 minutes in explanation of his vote.' (New Mexico Senate has a variant of this applicable after 6 hours with 30 minutes allowed subsequently.)

"Alabama Senate, rule 34:

" 'The committee on rules may at any time report a special rule that debate on a pending measure shall cease at a certain hour, and a vote be taken on the measure. The consideration of such special rule shall not exceed 30 minutes, when a vote shall be taken thereon.'

"Indiana Senate, rule 51, paragraph 2:

" 'The senate at any time, by resolution adopted by a majority of the senators-elect, may further limit the time of debate.' (E.g., shorten normal half-hour allowed each member.)

"Louisiana Senate, rule 9, second paragraph:

" 'The senate may at any time, by a majority vote, limit debate so that no senator shall be permitted to speak longer than 1 hour at one time without permission of the senate, and a motion to that effect shall be in order at any time, taking precedence over every other motion, except a motion to adjourn.' (Par. 1 prohibits a member from speaking more than twice to any question without permission of the senate.)

"Massachusetts Senate, rule 47:

" 'Debate may be closed at any time not less than 1 hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect. On this motion not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no member shall speak more than 3 minutes.' (Motion has high priority under rule 46.)

"Colorado Senate, rule X, paragraph 2:

" 'Debate may be closed at any time not less than 1 hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect, and upon a majority vote of the members-elect an hour may be fixed for a vote upon the pending measure. On either of these motions not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no Senator shall speak more than 3 minutes; and no other motion shall be entertained until the motion to close debate, or to fix an hour for the vote on the pending question, shall have been determined.'

"Rhode Island Senate rule 23 is the most comprehensive existing, to our knowledge, and is quoted below:

" 'When any bill, resolution or motion shall have been under consideration for 2 hours it shall be in order for any senator to move to close debate, and the president shall immediately recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put. The motion to close debate may be moved and ordered upon a single motion, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all pending amendments and include the bill, resolution, or motion to its passage or rejection. If such motion to close debate shall receive the affirmative votes of a majority of the senators present, a vote without further debate shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, resolution, or motion, provided that any senator who desires so to do shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding 5 minutes, and provided further that one motion to adjourn shall be in order before such vote is taken. Should said motion to adjourn be carried, the measure under consideration shall be the unfinished business of the senate until disposed of. All incidental questions of order pending at the time of such motion to close debate is made, and on such questions arising after a motion to close debate has been made and before the final vote has been taken on the matter or matters to which the motion to close debate shall have been directed whether the same be an appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate.' "

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a tabulation of the rules of the various State legislatures in respect to the following points: The number of times a member may speak without leave; the duration of permitted remarks; the motion for previous question authorized; and other cloture rules. This tabulation is complete, and I ask consent to have it incorporated at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

	Number of times member may speak without leave [1]		Duration of permitted remarks [2]		Motion for previous question authorized [3]		Other cloture rules (for text of statute)

[1] These are the general provisions as to the number of times a member may speak on a given issue. Where 2 is the rule, it is commonly stated that no member may speak his second time until all desiring to speak once have done so. Special provisos are often made, but not listed here, for committee chairmen, bill sponsors, movers of the question, etc. Moreover, special allowances are usually found for committee of the whole and certain types of business.

[2] These are the general provisions as to the length of debate. Special limits sometimes exist for particular classes of members or types of business.

[3] Frequently accompanied by special provisions tending toward an immediate vote.

[4] No member may speak more than once on a question until every other member desiring to be heard has spoken.

[5] In the aggregate on any question.

[6] Unnumbered rule on previous question, sec. 2.

[7] In any one day on the same question.

[8] During the last 25 days of the session members shall not speak longer than 10 minutes at any one time.

[9] Members may speak only once without leave, and may not speak more than twice to a question until every member desiring to speak has spoken.

[10] When bills are being considered prior to their last reading, debate thereon is limited to 10 minutes to each member.

[11] No senator may speak more than once to the exclusion of others, if objection is made without leave.

[12] Except by unanimous consent.

[13] In discussing any resolution, senators are limited to 5 minutes each.

[14] 20 minutes is allowed a member to speak to the main question, and 5 minutes on a subsidiary question; when the time of a senator is extended by leave of the senate, it must be for a specific period.

[15] No member may ordinarily speak more than 10 minutes on any main question, or 5 minutes on an amendment, without leave.

[16] Rule on motions and amendments in listing the precedence of motions (preceding Rule 64) lists the motion to close debate at a specific time.

[17] No member shall speak on any question longer than 15 minutes the first time or 5 minutes the second time, without leave.

[18] During the last 3 days of the session no member may speak longer than 10 minutes on any one question.

[19] Except by consent of two-thirds of the members present.

[20] No member may speak more than once on amendments or certain motions.

[21] No member may speak on a question longer than 30 minutes for the first speech and 15 minutes for the second speech, without leave; nor may he speak longer than 10 minutes on an amendment or certain motions.

[22] No member may speak to a question longer than 10 minutes the first time or 5 minutes the second time, except by unanimous consent.

	Number of times member may speak without leave [1]		Duration of permitted remarks [2]		Motion for previous question authorized [3]		Other cloture rules (for text of statute)
	Senate	House	Senate	House	Senate	House	Senate	House
Ohio	2	[5] 2		20 minutes [7]	Yes	Yes
Oklahoma	[4] [23] 2	[4] 2	5–10 minutes [24]	5 minutes	Yes	Yes		Rules 36, 37.
Oregon	2	[4] 2	([25])		Yes	Yes
Pennsylvania	2	2			Yes	Yes	Rule 9
Rhode Island	[4] 2	[4] 2			Yes	Yes	Rule 23	Rule 21.
South Carolina	[7] 2	[5] 2	2 hours [7]			Yes	Rule 14
South Dakota	[4] 2	[5] 2	10 minutes	10 minutes	Yes	Yes
Tennessee	[4] 2		10–20 minutes [26]	10–15 minutes [27]	Yes	Yes
Texas	[4] 2	[4] 2		10 minutes [28]	Yes	Yes
Utah	[4] [7] 2	[4] [7] 2			Prohibited	Yes		Rule 29.
Vermont	[4] 2	[4] 2			Prohibited
Virginia	[4] 2	[4] 2			Yes	Yes
Washington	[4] [7] 2	[29] 2		10 minutes [29]	Yes	Yes
West Virginia	[5] 2	[5] 2			Yes	Yes		Rule 38.
Wisconsin	[5] 2	[5] 2			Yes	Yes
Wyoming	[7] 2	[4] [7] 2	([30])		Yes	Yes

[23] Members may speak only once to an amendment to a question or a substitute question.

[24] No member may consume more than 10 minutes in debate on a question without the unanimous consent of the senate; and he may consume only 5 minutes when considering bills on general order, without such consent.

[25] During the last 10 days of the session, no member except the author of a bill shall be permitted to speak on its final passage for longer than 5 minutes, but members may waive their time in favor of another member; during those 10 days no member may speak on a motion or resolution longer than 3 minutes.

[26] No member may speak to a question longer than 20 minutes in the first speech and 10 minutes in the second.

[27] No member may speak to a question longer than 15 minutes in the first speech and 10 minutes in the second.

[28] The house by vote may extend the time allowed for only 10 minutes; but during the last 10 days of a regular session and the last 5 days of a special session the extension may be for 5 minutes only, and such extension requires unanimous consent.

[29] After the first 50 days of the session no member shall ordinarily speak more than once to the same question, without leave, or longer than 3 minutes.

[30] Any member is limited in debate on bills on third reading or amendments thereto to speaking not more than twice on the bill or on any one amendment, and may consume not more than 5 minutes each time he speaks.

Alabama Senate Rule 34: "The committee on rules may at any time report a special rule that debate on a pending measure shall cease at a certain hour, and a vote be taken on the measure. The consideration of such special rule shall not exceed 30 minutes, when a vote shall be taken thereon."

Arizona House Rule IX, par. 9: "There shall be no debate at the third reading of a bill except by a two-thirds vote of all members elected to the house."

Arkansas Senate Unnumbered Rule on Previous Question, sec. 2: "The previous question is the only motion used for closing debate in the senate itself except the motion to immediately consider * * *."

Arkansas House Rule XV, sec. 2: "The previous question is the only motion used for closing debate in the house itself except the motion to immediately consider * * *."

Colorado Senate Rule X, par. 2: "Debate may be closed at any time not less than 1 hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect, and upon a majority vote of the members-elect an hour may be fixed for a vote upon the pending measure. On either of these motions not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no senator shall speak more than 3 minutes; and no other motion shall be entertained until the motion to close debate, or to fix an hour for the vote on the pending question, shall have been determined."

Indiana Senate Rule 51: "Second.— * * * The senate at any time, by resolution adopted by a majority of the senators-elect, may further limit the time of debate."

Kentucky House Rule 12: "A motion to limit debate being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be, 'Shall debate be limited?' A majority of the members present may limit debate to the time specified in the motion at any time. The speaker shall proportion the time each member may speak under the motion to limit debate."

Louisiana Senate Rule 9: "* * * The senate may at any time, by a majority vote, limit debate so that no senator shall be permitted to speak longer than 1 hour at one time without permission of the senate, and a motion to that effect shall be in order at any time, taking precedence over every other motion, except a motion to adjourn."

Massachusetts Senate Rule 47: "Debate may be closed at any time not less than 1 hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect. On this motion not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no member shall speak more than 3 minutes."

Massachusetts House Rule 85: "Debate may be closed at any time not less than 30 minutes from the adoption of a motion to that effect. In case the time is extended by unanimous consent, the same rule shall apply at the end of the extended time as at the time originally fixed."

Mississippi Senate unnumbered rule: "Chamber provides for a motion to close debate but rule gives no details."

New Mexico Senate Rule 65: "When any bill, resolution or motion shall have been under consideration for 6 hours, it shall be in order for any senator to move to close the debate, and the president shall recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable as debatable and shall be immediately put, and if it shall receive affirmative votes of a majority of the senators present, the pending measure shall take precedence over all other business. The vote shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, motion or resolution, with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such motion, according to the rules of the senate, but without further debate, except that any senator who may desire so to do shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding one-half hour. After such motion to close debate has been made by any senator no other motion shall be in order until such motion has been voted upon by the senate. After the senate shall have adopted the motion to close debate, as hereinbefore provided, no motion shall be in order but one motion to adjourn and a motion to commit. Should said motion to adjourn be carried, the measure under consideration shall be the pending question when the senate shall again convene, and shall be taken up at the point where it was at the time of such adjournment. The motion to close debate may be ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill, resolution or motion to its passage or rejection. All incidental questions of order, or motions pending at the time such motion is made to close debate, whether the same be on appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate. Provided, however, that debate upon contested election cases shall be limited to 60 minutes. Upon such question no senator shall consume more than 3 minutes in debate thereof and no senator shall speak more than once."

New Mexico House Rule 78: "When any bill, resolution or motion shall have been under consideration for 3 hours it shall be in order for any member to move to close debate, and the speaker shall recognize the member who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put, and if it shall receive the affirmative votes of a majority of the members present, the pending measure shall take precedence over all other business. The vote shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, motion or resolution, with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such debate. After such motion to close debate has been made by any member no other motion shall be in order until such motion has been voted upon by the house. After the house shall have adopted the motion to close debate, as hereinbefore provided, no motion shall be in order but one motion to adjourn and a motion to recommit. The motion to close debate may be ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill, resolution or motion to its passage or rejection. All incidental questions or orders, or motions pending at the time such a motion is made to close debate, whether the same be an appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate."

New York Senate Rule 14, secs. 3 and 4:

"SEC. 3. When any bill, resolution or motion shall have been under consideration for two hours, it shall be in order for any senator to move to close debate, and the president shall recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put, and if it shall receive the affirmative vote of a majority of the senators present, the pending measure shall take precedence over all other business.

"SEC. 4. The vote shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, resolution or motion with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such motion, according to the rules of the senate, but without further debate, except that any senator who may desire so to do shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding 5 minutes; upon the rollcall any senator may speak not to exceed 5 minutes in explanation of his vote. After such motion to close debate has been made by any senator, no other motion shall be in order until such motion has been voted upon by the senate. After the senate shall have adopted the motion to close debate, as hereinbefore provided, no motion shall be in order but one motion to adjourn or for a call of the senate by the temporary president, and a motion to commit. Should said motion to adjourn be carried, the measure under consideration shall be the pending question when the senate shall again convene, and shall be taken up at the point where it was at the time of such adjournment. The motion to close debate may be ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments, and include the bill, resolution or motion to its passage or rejection. All incidental questions of order or motions pending at the time such motion is made to close debate, whether the same be on appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate."

North Carolina House Rule 19: "No member shall speak more than twice on the main question, nor longer than 30 minutes for the first speech and 15 minutes for the second speech, unless allowed to do so by the affirmative vote of a majority of the members present; nor shall he speak more than once upon an amendment or motion to commit or postpone, and then not longer than 10 minutes. But the house may, by consent of a majority, suspend the operations of this rule during any debate on any particular question before the house, or the committee on rules may bring in a special rule that shall be applicable to the debate on any bill."

Oklahoma House Rules 36 and 37: "These rules give each side 30 minutes in the aggregate to debate on final passage of a bill; provided, that when a bill or resolution carries an emergency section such section shall constitute a separate question, to be debatable for an aggregate of 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be allotted each side. When there is a majority and minority committee report, 5 minutes is allotted each side for debate on the question of receiving the majority or minority report."

Pennsylvania Senate Rule 9: This rule lists a motion to limit or extend the limits on debate, but the rule gives no details.

Rhode Island Senate Rule 23: "When any bill, resolution, or motion shall have been under consideration for 2 hours it shall be in order for any senator to move to close debate, and the president shall immediately recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put. The motion to close debate may be moved and ordered upon a single motion, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all pending amendments and include the bill, resolution, or motion to its passage or rejection. If such motion to close debate shall receive the affirmative votes of a majority of the senators present, a vote without further debate shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, resolution or motion, with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such motion, provided that any senator who desires so to do shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding 5 minutes, and provided further that one motion to adjourn shall be in order before such vote is taken. Should said motion to adjourn be carried, the measure under consideration shall be the unfinished business of the senate until disposed of. All incidental questions of order pending at the time of such motion to close debate is made, and on such questions arising after a motion to close debate has been made and before the final vote has been taken on the matter or matters to which the motion to close debate shall have been directed whether the same be an appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate."

Rhode Island House Rule 21: This rule provides for a motion to fix a time for closing debate, but the rule gives no details.

South Carolina Senate Rule 14: "* * * the debate on any question and the time when such question shall be voted upon may be fixed by a vote of two-thirds of the senate; and the debate on the question of fixing such time shall be limited within the discretion of the chair; and such motions shall have precedence of [other designated] motions * * *."

Utah House Rule 29: This rule provides for a motion to limit debate, but the rule gives no details.

West Virginia House Rule 38: "* * *. The house by majority vote may limit debate on any question."

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"LIMITATIONS ON DEBATE ADOPTED BY THE SENATE IN THE PAST

"1. From 1789 to 1806 the Senate rules provided for a previous question motion which, if adopted by majority vote, had the effect of ending debate and bringing a question to a vote.

"2. Since 1846 the Senate has frequently adopted unanimous-consent agreements which are a species of cloture.

"3. During the Civil War debate in secret session on matters relating to the rebellion was limited by rule to 5 minutes by any Member and was confined to the subject matter.

"4. In 1868 the Senate adopted a rule providing that motions to take up or proceed to the consideration of any question should be determined without debate.

"5. In 1870 the Senate adopted the Anthony rule limiting debate on the call of the calendar to one 5-minute speech per Senator on any question. The Anthony rule was made a standing rule in 1880. (Rule VIII.)

"6. During the 1870's Senate debate on appropriation bills was limited by the 5-minute rule.

"7. In 1881 the Senate agreed, for the remainder of the session, to limit debate to 15 minutes on a motion to consider a bill or resolution, no Senator to speak more than once or for longer than 5 minutes.

"8. In 1884 the Senate amended its rules to provide that all motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate. (Rule VIII.)

"9. In 1884 the Senate amended its 10th rule so as to provide that all motions to change the order of precedence on special orders, or to proceed to the consideration of other business, should be decided without debate.

"10. In 1884 the Senate provided by rule that motions to lay before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives should be determined without debate. (Rule VII, 7.)

"11. In 1908 it was decided that Senators could, by enforcement of the rules, be restrained from speaking on the same subject more than twice in the same legislative day.

"12. In 1917 the Senate adopted its present cloture rule. (Rule XXII.)

"13. In 1939 and 1945 the Senate passed executive reorganization acts containing an antifilibuster rule."

Mr. MORSE. The memorandum will show that such a generalization as the one advanced by those who have made the argument I am attempting to rebut is not sound. It will also show the matter of limitation of debate has been one of frequent discussion in the Senate. It has in recent years been successfully defeated so far as changing the existing rule is concerned, by way of the filibuster technique itself. Thus, we are confronted with the paradoxical situation that in order to eliminate the filibuster technique from the Senate we first have to defeat a filibuster. I do not know how many times the Senate is going to be willing to surrender in the face of that intimidation. I can merely go on hoping, as I said earlier in my remarks, that the happy day will come and come soon when both the Republican and Democratic Parties in the Senate will awaken to the fact—and I believe it to be a fact—that the great majority of the American people want us to end the filibustering technique in the Senate by the adoption of a rule that will successfully banish it from the Senate.

There was another very able speech made during the course of the debate which I want to answer very briefly. I refer to the speech by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]. He made his speech on March 1, 1949. The Senator challenged the proponents of the Hayden resolution to show how the American people have ever been harmed by the filibuster. I have already had inserted in the RECORD a list of the filibusters, as set forth in the corrected copy of the Galloway report, and I say one need only read that list and take into account the implications of the legislation filibustered to recognize that the public interest did suffer and has suffered as the result of many filibusters in the Senate. I would answer him further that the public interest has suffered, the rights of millions of fellow Americans have suffered, because the filibuster technique has made it possible to date to prevent the passage of civil-rights legislation, for example.

Of course the Senator from Mississippi does not agree with me on the merits of civil-rights legislation. But the fact that he does not agree with me on civil-rights legislation does not make his argument a sound one when he says, "Wherein has the public interest suffered as a result of the filibuster technique?" It has suffered not only in respect to civil-rights legislation but it has suffered in my judgment because of the many compromises, as I stated earlier in my remarks this afternoon, which frequently have to be made in committee before we can even get legislation to the floor of the Senate, under a threat that if we do not yield to minority demands the bill will be talked to death on the floor of the Senate. That is a terrible cost to have to pay for minority rule in the Senate.

The public interest has suffered also, as is evident from a statement of the legislation involved in bills held up by filibusters, as set forth in the Galloway report, because of the compromise changes that had to be made before the legislation was subsequently passed. The argument has been made in the course of the debate that eventually the legislation was passed. But the proponents of that argument do not tell us in what form it was finally passed. In many instances it was passed in compromised form, compromises having been forced by the threat of filibuster. That is rule by intimidation, not by majority vote. That is rule by legislative blackmail, not by democratic processes.

Let us not forget that over the years of the history of the filibuster there is a filibuster on bill X or issue X, and a whole series of bills behind it never get to a vote in that session because of the delay caused by the filibuster. That is a tremendous loss to the public. The record will show that in many instances many appropriation bills were lost. Is it any answer when the Senator from Mississippi says, "But eventually the bills were passed, eventually the appropriations were made?" I say that is no answer at all. How much of a loss is it to the people of the United States to have postponed for 1 or 2 or 3 years a very important appropriation for some great public development that ought to have been passed at the very time a filibuster backlogged it and prevented it from getting to the floor of the Senate for passage?

If we want to add up the great cost to the people of the United States caused merely by delay alone to bills which were held up and never got to the floor of the Senate for a vote because another bill was filibustered, the delay cost alone would be a complete answer to the Senator from Mississippi, who says, "In what way has the public interest suffered from filibustering practices in the Senate?" I answer, in a multitude of ways, at terrific cost to the public welfare; and we ought to end it. The more quickly we end it, the better for the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table entitled "Citations to later action on filibustered bills."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Citations to later action on filibuster bills

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in my remarks in 1949, I presented historical information on outstanding filibusters from 1841 to 1948. I have brought that list up to date. I ask unanimous consent that the material additional to the information contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 2, page 2148, on the subject, "Outstanding Senate Filibusters From 1841 to 1948," be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1949: A motion to take up a resolution (S. Res. 15) to amend the cloture rule was debated at intervals in the Senate from February 28 to March 17 when it was amended and agreed to.

1950. A motion to take up the FEPC bill (S. 1728) was debated in the Senate, May 8–9, 1950, a total of 9 days. Ten Senators spoke in favor of the motion to take up (really in support of the bill) and 8 Senators spoke against the motion. According to a rough calculation, the proponents of the motion and bill used 35 percent, and the opponents used 65 percent, of the space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD devoted to the subject. During the 9-day period 3,414 inches of the RECORD were consumed with discussion of FEPC and 2,835 inches with other matters.

Mr. MALONE filibustered for 11 hours against the conference report on the slot-machine bill (S. 3357) in December 1950.

1953: A prolonged debate took place on the so-called tidelands offshore oil bill. It began April 1 and ended May 5. The tidelands debate lasted for 35 days, one of the longest on record. During this debate Senator MORSE established a new record for the longest single speech. On April 24–25 he spoke for 22 hours and 26 minutes.

1954: An extended debate occurred in July 1954, on a bill to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 (S. 3690). The debate lasted 13 days. On July 26 Senator Knowland sought to invoke cloture on S. 3690, but his motion failed by a vote of 44 yeas to 42 nays.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in 1949, I presented the material which was referred to by the Senator from Illinois

[Mr. DOUGLAS] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] today on the subject matter of the limitation of debate requirements in State legislatures. It is very interesting. It is a part of the material which has already been authorized by the ruling of the Presiding Officer for insertion in the RECORD. But I want to join the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] in calling attention to the provisions of State laws in regard to limitation of debate in State legislatures. I wish to point out that it is very interesting that in Southern State after Southern State, in an overwhelming majority of them, provision is made for ending debate by a procedure which no United States Senator has proposed in the Senate—namely, by means of a simple motion for the previous question. That can be done by majority vote. At that point no provision is made for protection of the minority. At that point the previous question is put, and it is nondebatable; the vote is taken; and, in effect, cloture is slapped on the minority, in southern legislatures, as a general rule. However, Mr. President, we insist that Senators from the South, Senators from the North, Senators from the East, and Senators from the West be protected, under our proposal, by a very generous time provision for debate after cloture is invoked.

In addition, Mr. President, you will find in the material I am having inserted in the RECORD a table, which I prepared in 1949, in regard to what later happened to bills which were blocked in the Senate by filibusters. As you know, Mr. President, it is said that no good proposed legislation is ever defeated by a filibuster. However, that simply is not so. The statistics show it; the record is clear. Sometimes it takes a long time; but, Mr. President, if the eventual legislation was good when it was passed finally, ultimately, eventually, in most instances it was good proposed legislation, too, when it was blocked by filibuster. All that happened was that the people suffered a delay to which they never should have been subjected, in obtaining legislation to which they were entitled. So I have included that material.

Then, Mr. President, let me say—unless all Senators have lost their sense of humor—that in 1949 I was a Republican; and the first part of a speech I made then was in defense of a proposal of a Democratic President to limit debate in the Senate. In recent days I have not had a chance to talk to that great man. I am a little confused by some of the newspaper articles I have read about what his position is at the present time. Of course, I respect his right, as well as the right of anyone else, to change his mind, if he has changed it. I also know that in American public life there are few men whose position has been misrepresented more than has that of the great Harry Truman. But I do know what his position was in 1949; and then I stood up on the other side of the aisle and defended his position, and I did so against almost a solid bloc of Democratic Senators on this side of the aisle; and I had a little something to say about that in that speech.

It is interesting to me, at least, to see to what an extent opinion on this side of the aisle has changed since 1949, because now we find this great group of Democratic Senators joining with a group consisting of Republican Senators, who have joined forces in a bipartisan effort to try to return the Senate to rule by the majority; and in 1949 that was the position of the Democratic President, which I discussed and defended.

Mr. President, while waiting for word from a staff member as to the pleasure of the leadership of the Senate as to whether I shall make a motion for the Senate to take a recess, I do not need to read what I was going to read. Instead, I am having printed in the RECORD the position of the Democratic President of 1949 on cloture.

Mr. President, I have closed this first speech, and obviously the only speech I shall have to make before the vote is taken, on tomorrow, on the Anderson motion.

I shall vote for the Anderson motion, not on the theory—as I have said—that the Senate is not a continuing body, but on the theory that under the Constitution of the United States, in article I, section 5, the Senate has the right to proceed to adopt rules, including a modification of rule XXII as contained in the Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case of New Jersey proposal, and to do so by a majority vote.

I shall vote against the Johnson motion to lay on the table the Anderson motion. It is my opinion that those interested in full debate on the merits of the issue should vote against it.

In this instance, the tabling motion amounts to a cloture rule without adequate time for Senators, and particularly new Senators, to give the necessary study and consideration to the issue.

The motion to lay on the table is not an appropriate motion at this time because both the Senate and the people are entitled to a vote on the merits of the Anderson motion after full debate, rather than on a motion that seeks to bill it by a parliamentary device.

And if given the opportunity, I shall vote for the Douglas proposal to amend rule XXII. It reestablishes the principle of majority rule in the Senate in keeping with what our Founding Fathers intended.

For the same reason, I shall vote against the Johnson proposal to amend rule XXII.

What is sorely needed is a new Emancipation Proclamation, one to give parliamentary freedom to the people's representatives in the Senate and thereby guaranteeing protection to the people from the prospect of police-state rule by the few.

The fact that some of the supporters of the Anderson motion support it on one theory, whereas I support it on another theory, in no way, in my judgment, shows any inconsistency in objective.

So, Mr. President, I shall vote for the Anderson motion. I shall vote—when given an opportunity—for the Douglas-Humphrey-Javits-Case of New Jersey proposal.

I have no illusions; I think the probabilities are that an effective amendment of rule XXII will not be adopted at this session of the Senate. I think that is tragic. I think that in all probability a compromise along the lines of the Johnson compromise will be adopted. I hope not, but I am afraid it will be. In so doing, Mr. President, it will be without substance insofar as any effective check upon rule by minority in the Senate is concerned; and in the months ahead I shall be opposed to it on the platforms of America, as I have been opposed to the action taken by the Congress in 1957 on civil rights legislation.

Mr. President, I hope to live long enough, either as a Member of the Senate or outside the Senate, to see the Senate of the United States return to the principle of democratic government as laid down in "The Federalist Papers" from which I have quoted so extensively tonight.

MCGRAIN VERSUS DAUGHERTY

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF OHIO

(No. 28. Argued December 5, 1924. Decided January 17, 1927)

1. Deputies, with authority to execute warrants, may be appointed by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, under a standing order of the Senate, such appointments being sanctioned by practice and by acts of Congress fixing the compensation of the appointees and providing for its payment.

2. Such deputy may serve a warrant of attachment issued by the President of the Senate and addressed only to the Sergeant at Arms, in pursuance of a Senate resolution contemplating service by either.

3. A warrant of the Senate for attachment of a person who ignored a subpena from a Senate committee is supported by oath within the requirement of the fourth amendment when based upon the committee's report of the facts of the contumacy, made on the committee's own knowledge and having the sanction of the oath of office of its members.

4. Subpenas issued by a committee of the Senate to bring before it a witness to testify in an investigation authorized by the Senate, are as if issued by the Senate itself.

5. Therefore, in case of disobedience, the fact that the subpena and the contumacy, related only to testimony sought by a committee, is not a valid objection to a resolution of the Senate, and warrant issued thereon, requiring the defaulting witness to appear before the bar of the Senate itself, then and there to give the desired testimony.

6. Each House of Congress has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution.

7. This has support in long practice of the House, separately, and in repeated acts of Congress, all amounting to a practical construction of the Constitution.

8. The two Houses of Congress in their separate relations have not only such powers as are expressly granted them by the Constitution, but also such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to make the express powers effective, but neither is invested with "general" power to inquire into private affairs and compel disclosures.

9. A witness may rightfully refuse to answer where the bounds of the power are exceeded or the questions are not pertinent to the matter under inquiry.

10. A resolution of the Senate directing a committee to investigate the administration of the Department of Justice—whether its functions were being properly discharged or were being neglected or misdirected, and particularly whether the Attorney General and his assistants were performing or neglecting their duties in respect of the institution and prosecution of proceedings to punish crimes and enforce appropriate remedies against the wrongdoers, specific instances of alleged neglect being recited—concerned a subject on which legislation could be had which would be materially aided by the information which the investigation was calculated to elicit.

11. It is to be presumed that the object of the Senate in ordering such an investigation is to aid it in legislating.

12. It is not a valid objection to such investigation that it might disclose wrongdoing or crime by a public officer named in the resolution.

13. A resolution of the Senate, directing attachment of a witness who had disobeyed a committee subpena to such an investigation, and declaring that his testimony is sought with the purpose of obtaining "information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper," supports the inference, from the earlier resolution, of a legislative object. The suggestion of other action does not overcome the other part of the declaration and thereby invalidate the attachment proceedings.

14. In view of the character of the Senate as a continuing body, and its power to continue or revive, with its original functions, the committee before which the investigation herein involved was pending, the question of the legality of the attachment of the respondent as a contumacious witness did not become moot with the expiration of the Congress during which the investigation and the attachment were ordered (299 Fed. 620, reversed).

Appeal from a final order of the district court, in habeas corpus, discharging the respondent, Mally S. Daugherty, from the custody of John J. McGrain, Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, by whom he had been arrested, as a contumacious witness, under a warrant of attachment, issued by the President of the Senate in pursuance of a Senate resolution.

Mr. George W. Wickersham, special assistant to the Attorney General, with whom Attorney General Stone and Mr. William T. Chantland, special assistant to the Attorney General, were on the brief, for the appellant.

Each House of Congress has power to conduct an investigation in aid of its legislative functions, to compel attendance before it of witnesses and the production of books and papers which may throw light upon the subject of inquiry; subject, of course, to protection against the invasion of such privileges as those against unreasonable searches and seizures, self-incrimination, and the like. This power is for the purpose of aiding each House more fitly to discharge its legislative duties. The investigation ordered by the Senate resolution of March 1 was of that character; and the court below erred in the construction it put upon the resolution and in holding the entire proceeding void. For many years it has been the practice of both Houses of Congress to conduct investigations into matters of public interest within the general domain of Federal jurisdiction, and to summon witnesses to appear and give testimony and produce books and papers bearing upon the questions under investigation. (See secs. 102 and 104, Rev. Stat.) The power of the respective Houses to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses in order to secure information necessary or useful to enable them to perform their legislative functions was thus recognized by law, and defiance of that power made punishable as a crime against the United States. This was without impairing in the slightest the right of a House to employ the power regarding contempt to compel obedience to its orders. (In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661.)) The power of each House was asserted from the beginning, not because it was exercised by the House of Commons in England, but because it is "necessary or proper for carrying into execution" the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress, and each House thereof.

In December 1859 the Senate, by resolution, appointed a committee to inquire into the facts concerning the invasion and seizure of the armory and arsenal at Harper's Ferry and to report facts and recommended legislation, the committee to have power to send for persons and papers. In February 1860 a resolution was adopted directing the Sergeant at Arms to take into his custody the body of Thaddeus Hyatt, and to have the same forthwith before the bar of the Senate to answer as for a contempt of its authority. Pursuant to this resolution, Hyatt was brought before the bar, and a resolution was adopted, after a long debate, by a vote of 44 ayes and 10 noes, directing him to be committed by the Sergeant at Arms to the common jail of the District of Columbia, to be kept in close custody until he should signify his willingness to answer the questions propounded by the Senate. (Congressional Globe, 1st sess., 36th, pp. 1102, 1105.) In upholding the existence of the power, the Senate did not divide on sectional lines, and the vote was overwhelmingly in support of the asserted power.

The question seems never to have been squarely decided in this Court. In some cases, the point was expressly reserved for future decision; in others there are expressions of opinion strongly favoring the existence of the power. (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168. See Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray (Mass.) 226; Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204.)

The Massachusetts court in the above case did not reach its conclusions from any analogy to the privileges of Parliament, nor from any residuum of power left in the legislature because not taken away by the State constitution. The power was recognized as necessary to the functions expressly delegated to the legislature by the Constitution. The same principle is equally applicable to each House of Congress under the Constitution of the United States.

The point was reserved, in Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (211 U.S. 407) and Henry v. Henkel (235 U.S. 219). Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra, and Interstate Commerce Comm. v. Brimson (154 U.S. 447), seem slightly hostile to such a power. Marshall v. Gordon (243 U.S. 521, 543), contains an argumentative dictum in favor of the right. See the instances of legislative action cited, with approval, on the margin of the report. (Cf. Hinds' Precedents, vol. 3: 21, 24.)

A final proof that the express constitutional grant of certain judicial powers to Congress, or a House thereof, does not negative the implication of further powers of that nature (see Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat. at p. 232)) exists in the fact that the Constitution expressly forbids the exercise of the parliamentary judicial power of passing bills of attainder (art. I, sec. 9). Where there are both express grants and express prohibitions, the application of the principle expressio unius is self-contradictory, and so the field is left clear for ordinary implication with no bias ab initio against it.

The matter in the Kilbourn case was a settled debt, an executed transaction, one that should not be undone by legislative but only by judicial act, if at all, and which was being considered in the district court which was the proper forum of the bankruptcy proceedings. In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661) is of value here chiefly for the presumption of validity conceded to the Senate's resolution. The opinion shows that the usual presumption of validity of legislative acts applies to the resolution of a single House, indicates a qualification on the Kilbourn case, and disposes of the district court's point in the present case, that a legislative purpose was not expressly averred in the original resolution but only in the one directing Daugherty's arrest. It also shows that that case is not to be distinguished on the ground that the proceedings were under the statute, but that the Senate could have proceeded directly.

In Marshall v. Gordon (243 U.S. 521), "the contempt relied upon was not intrinsic to the right of the House to preserve the means of discharging its legislative duties" (p. 546). That is to say, while the right to punish contempts obstructing legislation was upheld, the letter sent by Marshall was not deemed to amount to an obstruction.

The rule to be derived from these contempt cases may be summarized thus: in addition to the express power to "punish its Members for disorderly behavior," (Constitution, art. I, sec. 5), each House has an implied power to punish outsiders for contempts (Anderson v. Dunn, supra); but no such power is implied in aid of a proceeding outside the jurisdiction of the House (Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra); however, a presumption of validity attaches to a resolution of either House, just as to legislation of both Houses jointly, so that all doubts are to resolve in its favor (In re Chapman), and an investigation of a public officer or department is therefore presumed legislative in purpose and therefore valid until the contrary is shown (Marshall v. Gordon, semble).

The power rests upon the well-settled rule of unexpressed power necessary or proper to the exercise of express powers, being recognized by the courts as necessarily a part of the constitutional grant. The leading case, of course, is McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316). That the principle of that case justifies the implication in favor of either House of Congress having power to punish contempts, is recognized in Marshall v. Gordon (p. 537). Multiplication of the cases following McCulloch v. Maryland, or of the practical arguments to show that the gathering of information by the compulsion of contempt proceedings is appropriate, if not imperative, for legislation under modern conditions, seems unnecessary.

A similar question arises where boards or commissions exercising delegated legislative power seek to compel testimony and the production of documents in the aid of its exercise. (Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (211 U.S. 407), and the language of the majority opinion is qualified by Smith v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (245 U.S. 33).) While the cases last cited are not controlling, they indicate a trend away from the idea expressed in the earlier cases and the opinion in the court below, that testimony can be compelled only in an investigation into a specific breach of existing law—a judicial inquiry. Furthermore, the case for a House of Congress investigating by its own committee is much stronger than that of an administrative body acting under delegated powers.

The question of the power of either House to compel testimony in aid of legislation has not been decided adversely in any of the inferior Federal courts. (See Ex parte Nugent (Fed. Cas., 10375 (1848)); In re Pacific Railway Comm. (32 Fed. 241); Henry v. Henke, supra; and 207 Fed. 805; Briggs v. Mackellar (2 Abbott's Practice, N.Y., 30); United States v. Sinclair (52 Wash. L. Rep. 451 (July 1924).)

A number of State court decisions have upheld the existence of the power here contended for (Briggs v. Mackellar (2 Abbott's Practice, N.Y., 30 (1835)); People v. Keeler

(99 N.Y. 462 (1885)); Matter of Barnes (204 N.Y. 108 (1912)); Burnham v. Morrissey (14 Gray 226); State v. Guilbert (75 Ohio St. 1, distg.); State v. Brewster (89 N.J.L. 658 (1916)); In re Falvey (7 Wis. 630 (1858)); Ex parte Parker (74 S.C. 466 (1906).)

It is submitted that the district court's distinction between the rule which obtains in States where the whole legislative power is vested in the legislature and those where all powers not expressly granted are reserved to the people, is wholly unsound in its application to the powers of Congress under the Constitution. The rule finally worked out by the courts and expressed by Chief Justice White in Marshall v. Gordon, supra, is based upon the doctrine of the grant by the Constitution of all powers necessary or proper to the use of the powers expressly granted. Each House has power to do whatever is customarily required to enable it intelligently to participate in the making of laws. Such implied power cannot be reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people, for it can only be exercised by the House itself. If it be not vested in such House, it exists nowhere. That is does exist in each House, and constantly has been exercised for nearly a century past, is abundantly demonstrated.

The English cases dealing with the powers of the House of Commons to compel testimony and punish for contempt of its process are interesting as furnishing a historical background but are not otherwise of great importance, their authority having been rejected by the Supreme Court (Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra); disregarded in Massachusetts and rejected in New York, both of which uphold the power (Burnham v. Morrissey, supra; People v. Keeler (99 N.Y. 463, 473)); and rejected in Ohio which denies it (State v. Guilbert, supra) (Regina v. Paty (2 Ld. Raym., 1105); Murray's case (1 Wils. 299); Brass Crosby's Case (3 Wils., 188); Rex v. Flower (8 T.R., 314); Burdett v. Abbott (14 East, 1); Stockdale v. Hansard (9 Ad. & E. 1); Stockdale v. Hansard (11 Ad. & E. 253); Case of Sheriff of Middlesex (11 Ad. & E. 273).)

The investigation ordered by the Senate, in the course of which the testimony of appellee and the production of books and records of the bank of which he is president were required, was legislative in its character. The investigation of the Attorney General's office was the exact action ordered. It is impossible to separate the person occupying that office, and his assistants from the office; and the resolution of March 1 directed the committee to investigate circumstances and facts concerning the alleged failure of the Attorney General to prosecute and defend cases wherein the Government of the United States was interested, and to inquire into his activities and those of his assistants in the Department, which would in any manner tend to impair their efficiency or influence as representatives of the Government. The resolution of April 26th, by which the issuance of a warrant was ordered to bring the body of the appellee before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry, is predicated upon a recital that "the appearance and testimony of the said M. S. Daugherty is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions imposed upon it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper." (See Chapman case (166 U.S. 661; People v. Keeler, supra; Kilbourn v. Thompson, supra; In re Falvey, supra; People v. Webb (5 N.Y. Supp., 855); People v. Milliken (185 N.Y. 35); Matter of Barnes, supra.

The Department of Justice is one of the great executive branches of the Government. It is created by statute (Rev. Stats., title VIII). The duties of the Attorney General and his assistants are in great measure defined by law. Annually Congress, with the concurrence of both Houses, appropriates large sums of money to be expended for the purpose of enforcing the law or defending the Government against claims in the courts, under the direction of the Attorney General and his assistants. Can it possibly be said that the discovery of any facts showing the neglect or failure of the Attorney General or his assistants properly to discharge the duties imposed upon them by law cannot be and would not naturally be used by Congress as the basis for new legislation safeguarding the interests of the Government and making more improbable in the future the commission of any illegal or improper acts which might be shown to have been committed in the past? Appellee by refusing to appear in response to either subpena and be sworn to testify, can only succeed in this case by establishing that the entire proceeding was void as beyond the constitutional powers of the Senate. Questions as to the materiality or relevancy of evidence are for later consideration.

Messrs. Arthur I. Vorys and John P. Phillips, with whom Mr. Webb I. Vorys was on the brief, for the appellee.

The arrest is the result of an attempt of the Senate to vest its committee with judicial power in a case which is not among those specifically enumerated. The Court must determine the nature of the power which the Senate is attempting to exercise, and is not concluded by any post litem avowal made after the summons was issued, served, and resisted, and after a court of competent jurisdiction had enjoined the exercise of the power. In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U.S. 168), In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661), and Marshall v. Gordon (243 U.S. 521), this Court examined the resolutions under which the investigations were being conducted and found that they were sufficient to exhibit the nature of the investigations and the purpose of the investigators. But the Court is not limited to the formal words of this resolution, for it is the fact which is determinative and which this Court must find. What the Senate intends to do and in fact is doing determines the character of its proceeding. It cannot be said that, as the Senate has not declared what it intends to do at the conclusion of the investigation, therefore the investigation is not judicial and not executive, and consequently it must be legislative in character. Nor that, as the Senate at the end of the investigation can do nothing in a judicial or executive capacity, therefore it must be assumed that its action, if any, will be in a legislative capacity.

The preamble of Senate Resolution 157, which clearly indicates its purpose, was stricken out upon final passage of the resolution, not because the purpose of the Senate had changed in any particular but because the Senate did not desire to condemn the Attorney General without a trial. Throughout the debate upon the resolution the idea recurs constantly that the Attorney General is to be placed on trial. There is no suggestion of legislative action, or in fact of any action other than the ascertainment of facts with respect to the charges of malfeasance in office of Harry M. Daugherty and the publication of the same for the purpose of forcing him to resign. Only twice during the whole debate was there any pretense that the investigators were to engage in anything other than a trial of Mr. Daugherty.

The committee has assumed all of the functions of prosecutor, judge, and jury with apparently none of the customary rules governing evidence and procedure. The Court, however, need go no further than the resolution which, in apt words, reposes in the investigating committee judicial duties, and judicial duties alone. The personal cast of the resolution, the inability of the committee to do anything except to try the facts concerning the charges contained in the resolution and the total inability of the Senate to use the findings of the investigating committee for any purpose other than to pillory Harry M. Daugherty before the American people, clearly demonstrate that the proceeding is an attempt to usurp the judicial function. Of most important significance is the fact that the first hint of any pretense that this inquisition was being conducted for legislative purposes was the ex post facto recital of a "basis for such legislation and other action" in the resolution of April 26, 1924, authorizing a warrant for the arrest of the appellee. This afterthought was inserted after the proceeding and injunction in the Fayette County court and when the Senate knew that the validity of its resolution had been challenged in that proceeding on the ground that it conferred judicial authority. The Senate of the United States cannot override the constitutional rights of a private citizen by a mere additional word of gesture.

The Senate when acting in its legislative capacity has no power to arrest in order to compel testimony; the Senate can compel testimony only in cases where it has judicial power specifically granted by the Constitution. Any argument which begins with an assertion that citizens owe a duty to give testimony and thereupon asserts that Congress, or a branch thereof, may enforce this duty by its own processes, will result in nullifying the express division of powers among the three branches of Government.

At the time our Constitution was adopted the process of arrest resided solely in the judiciary. (Marshall v. Gordon (243 U.S. 521, 533).) In England the power to arrest and punish was retained by the House of Commons because of ancient privilege and prescription and not because of legislative right. The power of arrest has never been accorded to inferior legislative or administrative bodies. In the few instances in which such an attempt has been made, the power has been denied whenever it has been challenged in the courts. Langenberg v. Decker (131 Ind. 471); Re Sims (54 Kans. 1); Kielley v. Carson (4 Moore P.C. 63); Fenton v. Hampton (11 Moore P.C. 347); Ex parte Dansereau (19 Lower Canada Jurist, 210).

This Court has never decided that the Congress, or either branch of it, has power, in its legislative capacity, to cause the arrest of a witness in order to compel him to testify. The intimations of the learned jurists to the contrary are so plain that it is impossible to piece out what opposing counsel have called "expressions strongly favoring the existence of the power." (Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U.S. 168); Interstate Commerce Comm. v. Brimson (154 U.S. 447); In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661); Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (211 U.S. 407); Marshall v. Gordon, supra; Boyd v. United States (116 U.S. 616); Ellis v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (237 U.S. 434); Federal Trade Comm. v. American Tobacco Co. (264 U.S. 298); Ex parte Nugent (Fed. Cas. 10375); Re Pacific Railway Comm. (32 Fed 250); Smith v. Interstate Commerce Comm. (245 U.S. 33).)

Congress, under the Federal Constitution, has only those powers which are granted to it, but many of the State legislatures differ from the English Parliament only in the degree of their powers, having all powers not expressly or impliedly denied by the State constitutions. From this it follows that the same canons of interpretation do not apply to the State legislatures and the National Congress. (People v. Keeler (99 N.Y. 463); Ex parte Parker (74 S.C. 466); Burnham v. Morrissey (14 Gray (Mass.) 226); Whitcomb's Case (120 Mass. 118).) Those who have contended that the power to compel testimony is a legislative power have urged it as a necessity. The proponents of this argument resort to the famous definition and amplification of the word "necessary" of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 306). The reasoning is fallacious and circuitous. Marshall was considering the power of the United States to establish a national bank. He referred to clause 18 of article I, section 8, of the Constitution, in which Congress was given power to make laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly given. He was not implying a grant of power which, because it might be convenient, or appropriate in the exercise of another power, would therefore be permitted to override the constitutional guaranties of the private citizen. In the cases which have followed and adopted Mr. Chief Justice Marshall's definition, no case has implied such a grant from convenience so as to override the express guaranties of the Bill of Rights contained in the first 10 amendments. Not even when Congress is given an express power can that power be exercised in derogation of the express guaranties of individual liberty. (Interstate Commerce Comm. v. Brimson (154 U.S. 447).) If Congress has no such power where there is a specific grant, certainly Congress cannot destroy personal guaranties through any implied grant incidental to the general power to enact laws. The only satisfactory determination of the substantive question in this case should be that the power to arrest a recusant witness is a judicial process and confined to the jurisdiction of the courts, and that the Senate has no power to arrest a recusant witness except in the cases in which the Constitution gives the Senate judicial power.

If Congress has power to compel the production of evidence, to aid Congress in formulating further legislation, then Congress both Houses concurring, must declare its purpose, and the demand for the information. The Senate cannot legislate, and the Senate cannot compel testimony relating to proposed legislation which the Senate alone has in mind. (Const., art. I, sec. 1; see State v. Guilbert (75 O.S. 1).)

If a witness may be compelled to testify in order to aid the Senate in the formulation of legislation, then it must be shown what legislation the Senate has in view and that the evidence sought is pertinent to the subject matter of legislation under consideration, and the testimony of the witness can be compelled only through judicial process of the Court. In order to justify the compulsory discovery of evidence it must appear for what purpose the testimony is sought and the materiality of the evidence must be affirmatively shown. (Federal Trade Comm. v. American Tobacco Co. (264 U.S. 298); Hale v. Henkel (201 U.S. 43). Matter of Barnes (204 N.Y. 108); United States v. Searles (25 Wash. L. Rep. 384).)

Senate Resolution 157 not only does not show what subjects of legislation were in contemplation, but does show the purpose of the investigation, namely, to determine as to the alleged guilt of Harry M. Daugherty. There is nothing in the record to show what proposed subject matters of legislation were under consideration, and in no way can it be seen that the testimony of the appellee or the books and records of the bank and the accounts of the bank's customer could furnish information that would be useful in framing any legislation shown to have been in the mind of the Senate or of any member thereof.

The warrant issued by the President pro tempore of the Senate was not supported by oath or affirmation as required by the Federal Constitution. Even a bench warrant must be supported by oath. No arrest or attachment for contempt can issue from any court where the contempt is constructive or outside of the presence of the court without a supporting affidavit.

The arrest of Mr. Daugherty is illegal for the reason that it was made under a warrant to bring him forcibly before the Senate to answer the Senate's questions before he had been subpenaed by the Senate and had refused to obey the Senate.

This Court will respect the jurisdiction and order of the State court, and will make no order which may effectuate a violation of the injunction or conflict with the purpose and spirit of the injunction.

The law does not provide for any deputy Sergeant at Arms. If there were such a officer, this warrant could not be executed by him because it is directed to the Sergeant at Arms and not to a deputy.

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an appeal from the final order in a proceeding in habeas corpus discharging a recusant witness held in custody under process of attachment issued from the U.S. Senate in the course of an investigation which it was making of the administration of the Department of Justice. A full statement of the case is necessary.

The Department of Justice is one of the great executive departments established by congressional enactment and has charge, among other things, of the initiation and prosecution of all suits, civil and criminal, which may be brought in the right and name of the United States to compel obedience or punish disobedience to its laws, to recover property obtained from it by unlawful or fraudulent means, or to safeguard its rights in other respects; and also of the assertion and protection of its interests when it or its officers are sued by others. The Attorney General is the head of the department, and its functions are all to be exercised under his supervision and direction.[1]

Harry M. Daugherty became the Attorney General March 5, 1921, and held that office until March 28, 1924, when he resigned. Late in that period various charges of misfeasance and nonfeasance in the Department of Justice after he became its supervising head were brought to the attention of the Senate by individual Senators and made the basis of an insistent demand that the Department be investigated to the end that the practices and deficiencies which, according to the charges, were operating to prevent or impair its right administration might be definitely ascertained and that appropriate and effective measures might be taken to remedy or eliminate the evil. The Senate regarded the charges as grave and requiring legislative attention and action. Accordingly it formulated, passed, and invited the House of Representatives to pass (and that body did pass) two measures taking important litigation then in immediate contemplation out of the control of the Department of Justice and placing the same in charge of special counsel to be appointed by the President; [2] and also adopted a resolution authorizing and directing a select committee of five Senators—"to investigate circumstances and facts, and report the same to the Senate, concerning the alleged failure of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute properly violators of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act against monopolies and unlawful restraint of trade; the alleged neglect and failure of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to arrest and prosecute Albert B. Fall, Harry F. Sinclair, E. L. Doheny, C. R. Forbes, and their coconspirators in defrauding the Government as well as the alleged neglect and failure of the said Attorney General to arrest and prosecute many others for violations of Federal statutes, and his alleged failure to prosecute properly, efficiently, and promptly, and to defend, all manner of civil and criminal actions wherein the Government of the United States is interested as a party plaintiff or defendant. And said committee is further directed to inquire into, investigate, and report to the Senate the activities of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and any of his assistants in the Department of Justice which would in any manner tend to impair their efficiency or influence as representatives of the Government of the United States."

The resolution also authorized the committee to send for books and papers, to subpena witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable.[3]

In the course of the investigation the committee issued and caused to be duly served on Mally S. Daugherty—who was a brother of Harry M. Daugherty and president of the Midland National Bank of Washington Court House, Ohio,—a subpena commanding him to appear before the committee for the purpose of giving testimony bearing on the subject under investigation, and to bring with him the "deposit ledgers of the Midland National Bank since November 1, 1920; also note files and transcript of owners of every safety vault; also records of income drafts; also records of any individual account or accounts showing withdrawals of amounts of $25,000 or over during above period." The witness failed to appear.

A little later in the course of the investigation the committee issued and caused to be duly served on the same witness another subpena commanding him to appear before it for the purpose of giving testimony relating to the subject under consideration—nothing being said in this subpena about bringing records, books or papers. The witness again failed to appear; and no excuse was offered by him for either failure.

The committee then made a report to the Senate stating that the subpenas had been issued, that according to the officer's returns—copies of which accompanied the report—the witness was personally served; and that he had failed and refused to appear.[4] After a reading of the report, the Senate adopted a resolution reciting these facts and proceeding as follows: [5]

"Whereas the appearance and testimony of the said M. S. Daugherty is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions imposed upon it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of the said M. S. Daugherty wherever found, and to bring the said M. S. Daugherty before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate may order the President of the Senate pro tempore to propound; and to keep the said M. S. Daugherty in custody to await the further order of the Senate."

It will be observed from the terms of the resolution that the warrant was to be issued in furtherance of the effort to obtain the personal testimony of the witness and, like the second subpena, was not intended to exact from him the production of the various records, books, and papers named in the first subpena.

The warrant was issued agreeably to the resolution and was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms. That officer on receiving the warrant endorsed thereon a direction that it be executed by John J. McGrain, already his deputy, and delivered it to him for execution.

The deputy, proceeding under the warrant, took the witness into custody at Cincinnati, Ohio, with the purpose of bringing him before the bar of the Senate as commanded; whereupon the witness petitioned the Federal district court in Cincinnati for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was granted and the deputy made due return setting forth the warrant and the cause of the detention. After a hearing the court held the attachment and detention unlawful and discharged the witness, the decision being put on the ground that the Senate in directing the investigation and in ordering the attachment exceeded its powers under the Constitution (299 Fed. 620). The deputy prayed and was allowed a direct appeal to this Court under section 238 of the Judicial Code as then existing.

We have given the case earnest and prolonged consideration because the principal questions involved are of unusual importance and delicacy. They are (a) whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution, and (b) whether it sufficiently appears that the process was being employed in this instance to obtain testimony for that purpose.

Other questions are presented which in regular course should be taken up first.

The witness challenges the authority of the deputy to execute the warrant on two grounds—that there was no provision of law for a deputy, and that, even if there were such a provision, a deputy could not execute the warrant because it was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms. We are of opinion that neither ground is tenable.

The Senate adopted in 1889 and has retained ever since a standing order declaring that the Sergeant at Arms may appoint deputies to serve process or perform other duties in his stead, that they shall be "officers of the Senate," and that acts done and returns made by them "shall have like effect and be of the same validity as if performed or made by the Sergeant at Arms in person."[6] In actual practice the Senate has given full effect to the order; and Congress has sanctioned the practice under it by recognizing the deputies, sometimes called assistants, as officers of the Senate, by fixing their compensation and by making appropriations to pay them.[7] Thus there was ample provision of law for a deputy.

The fact that the warrant was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms is not of special significance. His authority was not to be tested by the warrant alone. Other criteria were to be considered. The standing order and the resolution under which the warrant was issued plainly contemplated that he was to be free to execute the warrant in person or to direct a deputy to execute it. They expressed the intention of the Senate; and the words of the warrant were to be taken, as they well could be, in a sense which would give effect to that intention. Thus understood, the warrant admissibly could be executed by a deputy if the Sergeant at Arms so directed, which he did.

The case of Sanborn v. Carleton (15 Gray 399) on which the witness relies, related to a warrant issued to the Sergeant at Arms in 1860, which he deputed another to execute. At that time there was no standing rule or statute permitting him to act through a deputy; nor was there anything in the resolution under which the warrant was issued indicative of a purpose to permit him to do so. All that was decided was that in the absence of a permissive provision, in the warrant or elsewhere, he could not commit its execution to another. The provision which was absent in that case and deemed essential is present in this.

The witness points to the provision in the fourth amendment to the Constitution declaring "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation" and contends that the warrant was void because the report of the committee on which it was based was unsworn. We think the contention overlooks the relation of the committee to the Senate and to the matters reported, and puts aside the accepted interpretation of the constitutional provision.

The committee was a part of the Senate, and its members were acting under their oath of office as Senators. The matters reported pertained to their proceedings and were within their own knowledge. They had issued the subpenas, had received and examined the officer's returns thereon (copies of which accompanied the report), and knew the witness had not obeyed either subpena or offered any excuse for his failure to do so.

The constitutional provision was not intended to establish a new principle but to affirm and preserve a cherished rule of the common law designed to prevent the issue of groundless warrants. In legislative practice committee reports are regarded as made under the sanction of the oath of office of its members; and where the matters reported are within the committee's knowledge and constitute probable cause for an attachment such reports are acted on and given effect without requiring that they be supported by further oath or affirmation. This is not a new practice but one which has come down from an early period. It was well recognized before the constitutional provision was adopted, has been followed ever since, and appears never to have been challenged until now. Thus it amounts to a practical interpretation, long continued, of both the original common law rule and the affirming constitutional provision, and should be given effect accordingly.[8]

The principle underlying the legislative practice has also been recognized and applied in judicial proceedings. This is illustrated by the settled rulings that courts in dealing with contempts committed in their presence may order commitments without other proof than their own knowledge of the occurrence,[9] and that they may issue attachments, based on their own knowledge of the default, where intended witnesses or jurors fail to appear in obedience to process shown by the officer's return to have been duly served.[10] A further illustration is found in the rulings that grand jurors, acting under the sanction of their oaths as such, may find and return indictments based solely on their own knowledge of the particular offenses, and that warrants may be issued on such indictments without further oath or affirmation;[11] and still another is found in the practice which recognizes that where grand jurors, under their oath as such, report to the court that a witness brought before them has refused to testify, the court may act on that report, although otherwise unsworn, and order the witness brought before it by attachment.[12]

We think the legislative practice, fortified as it is by the judicial practice, shows that the report of the committee—which was based on the committee's own knowledge and made under the sanction of the oath of office of its members—was sufficiently supported by oath to satisfy the constitutional requirement.

The witness also points to the provision in the warrant and in the resolution under which it was issued requiring that he be "brought before the bar of the Senate, then and there" to give testimony "pertinent to the subject under inquiry," and contends that an essential prerequisite to such an attachment was wanting, because he neither had been subpenaed to appear and testify before the Senate nor had refused to do so. The argument in support of the contention proceeds on the assumption that the warrant of attachment "is to be treated precisely the same as if no subpena had been issued by the committee, and the same as if the witness had not refused to testify before the committee." In our opinion the contention and the assumption are both untenable. The committee was acting for the Senate and under its authorization; and therefore the subpenas which the committee issued and the witness refused to obey are to be treated as if issued by the Senate. The warrant was issued as an auxiliary process to compel him to give the testimony sought by the subpena; and its nature in this respect is not affected by the direction that his testimony be given at the bar of the Senate instead of before the committee. If the Senate deemed it proper, in view of his contumacy, to give that direction it was at liberty to do so.

The witness sets up an interlocutory injunction granted by a State court at Washington Court House, Ohio, in a suit brought by the Midland National Bank against two members of the investigating committee, and contends that the attachment was in violation of that injunction and therefore unlawful. The contention is plainly ill-founded. The injunction was granted the same day the second subpena was served, but whether earlier or later in the day does not appear. All that the record discloses about the injunction is comprised in the paragraph copied in the margin from the witness's petition for habeas corpus.[13] But it is apparent from what is disclosed that the injunction did not purport to place any restraint on the witness, nor to restrain the committee from demanding that he appear and testify personally to what he knew respecting the subject under investigation; and also that what the injunction did purport to restrain has no bearing on the power of the Senate to enforce that demand by attachment.

[13] "On the 11th day of April 1924, in an action in the court of common pleas of said Fayette County, Ohio, in which said the Midland National Bank was plaintiff and said B. K. Wheeler and Smith W. Brookhart were defendants, upon the petition of said bank said court granted a temporary restraining order enjoining and restraining

In approaching the principal questions, which remain to be considered, two observations are in order. One is, that we are not now concerned with the direction in the first subpena that the witness produce various records, books, and papers of the Midland National Bank. That direction was not repeated in the second subpena; and is not sought to be enforced by the attachment. This was recognized by the court below (299 Fed. 623), and is conceded by counsel for the appellant. The other is that we are not now concerned with the right of the Senate to propound or the duty of the witness to answer specific questions, for as yet no questions have been propounded to him. He is asserting—and is standing on his assertion—that the Senate is without power to interrogate him, even if the questions propounded be pertinent and otherwise legitimate—which for present purposes must be assumed.

The first of the principal questions—the one which the witness particularly presses on our attention—is, as before shown, whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution.

The Constitution provides for a Congress consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives and invests it with "all legislative powers" granted to the United States, and with power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" for carrying into execution these powers and "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the United States or in any department or officer thereof (art. I, secs. 1, 8). Other provisions show that, while bills can become laws only after being considered and passed by both Houses of Congress, each House is to be distinct from the other, to have its own officers and rules, and to exercse its legislative function independently [14] (art. I, secs. 2, 3, 5, 7). But there is no provision expressly investing either House with power to make investigations and exact testimony to the end that it may exercise its legislative function advisedly and effectively. So the question arises whether this power is so far incidental to the legislative function as to be implied.

In actual legislative practice power to secure needed information by such means has long been treated as an attribute of the power to legislate. It was so regarded in the British Parliament and in the colonial legislatures before the American Revolution; and a like view has prevailed and been carried into effect in both Houses of Congress and in most of the State legislatures.[15]

This power was both asserted and exerted by the House of Representatives in 1792, when it appointed a select committee to inquire into the St. Clair expedition and authorized the committee to send for necessary persons, papers, and records. Mr. Madison, who had taken an important part in framing the Constitution only 5 years before, and four of his associates in that work, were Members of the House of Representatives at the time, and all voted for the inquiry. (3 Cong. Ann. 494). Other exertions of the power by the House of Representatives, as also by the Senate, are shown in the citations already made. Among those by the Senate, the inquiry ordered in 1859 respecting the raid by John Brown and his adherents on the armory and arsenal of the United States at Harper's Ferry is of special significance. The resolution directing the inquiry authorized the committee to send for persons and papers, to inquire into the facts pertaining to the raid and the means by which it was organized and supported, and to report what legislation, if any, was necessary to preserve the peace of the country and protect the public property. The resolution was briefly discussed and adopted without opposition. (Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 141, 152.) Later on the committee reported that Thaddeus Hyatt, although subpenaed to appear as a witness, had refused to do so; whereupon the Senate ordered that he be attached and brought before it to answer for his refusal. When he was brought in he answered by challenging the power of the Senate to direct the inquiry and exact testimony to aid it in exercising its legislative function. The question of power thus presented was thoroughly discussed by several Senators—Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts taking the lead in denying the power and Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, in supporting it. Sectional and party lines were put aside and the question was debated and determined with special regard to principle and precedent. The vote was taken on a resolution pronouncing the witness' answer insufficient and directing that he be committed until he should signify that he was ready and willing to testify. The resolution was adopted—44 Senators voting for it and 10 against. (Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1100–1109, 3006–3007.) The arguments advanced in support of the power are fairly reflected by the following excerpts from the debate:

Mr. Fessenden, of Maine: "Where will you stop? Stop, I say, just at that point where we have gone far enough to accomplish the purposes for which we were created; and these purposes are defined in the Constitution. What are they? The great purpose is legislation. There are some other things, but I speak of legislation as the principal purpose. Now, what do we propose to do here? We propose to legislate upon a given state of facts, perhaps, or under a given necessity. Well, sir, proposing to legislate, we want information. We have it not ourselves. It is not to be presumed that we know everything; and if any body does presume it, it is a very great mistake, as we know by experience. We want information on certain subjects. How are we to get it? The Senator says, ask for it. I am ready to ask for it; but suppose the person whom we ask will not give it to us: what then? Have we not power to compel him to come before us? Is this power, which has been exercised by Parliament, and by all legislative bodies down to the present day without dispute—the power to inquire into subjects upon which they are disposed to legislate—lost to us? Are we not in the possession of it? Are we deprived of it simply because we hold our power here under a Constitution which defines what our duties are, and what we are called upon to do?

"Congress have appointed committees after committees, time after time, to make inquiries on subjects of legislation. Had we not power to do it? Nobody questioned our authority to do it. We have given them authority to send for persons and papers during the recess. Nobody questioned our authority. We appoint committees during the session, with power to send for persons and papers. Have we not that authority, if necessary to legislation?

"Sir, with regard to myself, all I have to inquire into is: is this a legitimate and proper object, committed to me under the Constitution; and then, as to the mode of accomplishing it, I am ready to use judiciously, calmly, moderately, all the power which I believe is necessary and inherent, in order to do that which I am appointed to do; and, I take it, I violate no rights, either of the people generally or of the individual, by that course."

Mr. Crittenden of Kentucky: "I come now to a question where the cooperation of the two branches is not necessary. There are some things that the Senate may do. How? According to a mode of its own. Are we to ask the other branch of the Legislature to concede by law to us the power of making such an inquiry as we are now making? Has not each branch the right to make what inquiries and investigation it thinks proper to make for its own action? Undoubtedly. You say we must have a law for it. Can we have a law? Is it not, from the very nature of the case, incidental to you as a Senate, if you, as a Senate, have the power of instituting an inquiry and of proceeding with that inquiry? I have endeavored to show that we have that power. We have a right, in consequence of it, a necessary incidental power, to summon witnesses, if witnesses are necessary. Do we require the concurrence of the other House to that? It is a power of our own. If you have a right to do the thing of your own motion, you must have all powers that are necessary to do it.

"The means of carrying into effect by law all the granted powers, is given where legislation is applicable and necessary; but there are subordinate matters, not amounting to laws; there are inquiries of the one House or the other House, which each House has a right to conduct; which each has, from the beginning, exercised the power to conduct; and each has, from the beginning, summoned witnesses. This has been the practice of the Government from the beginning; and if we have a right to summon the witness, all the rest follows as a matter of course."

The deliberate solution of the question on that occasion has been accepted and followed on other occasions by both Houses of Congress, and never has been rejected or questioned by either.

The State courts quite generally have held that the power to legislate carries with it by necessary implication ample authority to obtain information needed in the rightful exercise of that power, and to employ compulsory process for the purpose.

In Burnham v. Morrisey (14 Gray 226, 239), the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in sustaining an exertion of this power by one branch of the legislature of that Commonwealth, said:

said defendants and their agents, servants, and employees from entering into said banking room and from taking, examining, or investigating any of the books, accounts, records, promissory notes, securities, letters, correspondence, papers, or any other property of said bank or of its depositors, borrowers, or customers in said banking room and from in any manner molesting and interfering with the business and affairs of said bank, its officers, agents, servants, and the business of its depositors, borrowers, and customers with said bank until the further order of said court. The said defendants were duly served with process in said action and duly served with copies of said temporary restraining order on said 11th day of April 1924, and said injuction has not been modified by said court and no further order has been made in said case by said court, and said injunction is in full force and effect."

"The house of representatives has many duties to perform, which necessarily require it to receive evidence and examine witnesses.* * * It has often occasion to acquire certain knowledge of facts, in order to the proper performance of legislative duties. We therefore think it clear that it has the constitutional right to take evidence, to summon witnesses, and to compel them to appear and testify. This power to summon and examine witnesses it may exercise by means of committees."

In Wilckens v. Willet (1 Keyes 521, 525), a case which presented the question whether the House of Representatives of the United States possesses this power, the Court of Appeals of New York said:

"That the power exists there admits of no doubt whatever. It is a necessary incident to the sovereign power of making laws; and its exercise is often indispensable to the great end of enlightened, judicious, and wholesome legislation."

In People v. Keeler (99 N. Y. 463, 482, 483), where the validity of a statute of New York recognizing and giving effect to this power was drawn in question, the court of appeals approvingly quoted what it had said in Wilckens v. Willet, and added:

"It is difficult to conceive any constitutional objection which can be raised to the provision authorizing legislative committees to take testimony and to summon witnesses. In many cases it may be indispensable to intelligent and effectual legislation to ascertain the facts which are claimed to give rise to the necessity for such legislation, and the remedy required, and, irrespective of the question whether in the absence of a statute to that effect either house would have the power to imprison a recusant witness, I cannot yield to the claim that a statute authorizing it to enforce its process in that manner is in excess of the legislative power. To await the slow process of indictment and prosecution for a misdemeanor, might prove quite ineffectual, and necessary legislation might be obstructed, and perhaps defeated, if the legislative body had no other and more summary means of enforcing its right to obtain the required information. That the power may be abused, is no ground for denying its existence. It is a limited power, and should be kept within its proper bounds; and, when these are exceeded, a jurisdictional question is presented which is cognizable in the courts." * * * "Throughout this Union the practice of legislative bodies, and in this State, the statutes existing at the time the present Constitution was adopted, and whose validity has never before been questioned by our courts, afford strong arguments in favor of the recognition of the right of either house to compel the attendance of witnesses for legislative purposes, as one which has been generally conceded to be an appropriate adjunct to the power of legislation, and one which, to say the least, the State legislature has constitutional authority to regulate and enforce by statute."

Other decisions by State courts recognizing and sustaining the legislative practice are found in Falvey v. Massing (7 Wis. 630, 635–638); State v. Frear (138 Wis. 173); Ex parte Parker (74 S.C. 466, 470); Sullivan v. Hill (73 W. Va. 49, 53); Lowe v. Summers (69 Mo. Ap. 637, 649–650). An instructive decision on the question is also found in Ex parte Dansereau ((1875), 19 L. C. Jur. 210), where the legislative assembly of the Province of Quebec was held to possess this power as a necessary incident of its power to legislate.

We have referred to the practice of the two Houses of Congress; and we now shall notice some significant congressional enactments. May 3, 1798 (c. 36, 1 Stat. 554), Congress provided that oaths or affirmations might be administered to witnesses by the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or the chairman of a select committee, "in any case under their examination." February 8, 1817 (c. 10, 3 Stat. 345), it enlarged that provision so as to include the chairman of a standing committee. January 24, 1857 (c. 19, 11 Stat. 155), it passed "An act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House of Congress, and to compel them to discover testimony." This act provided, first, that any person summoned as a witness to give testimony or produce papers in any matter under inquiry before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House, who should willfully make default, or, if appearing, should refuse to answer any question pertinent to the inquiry, should, in addition to the pains and penalties then existing,[16] be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to indictment and punishment as there prescribed; and secondly, that no person should be excused from giving evidence in such an inquiry on the ground that it might tend to incriminate or disgrace him, nor be held to answer criminally, or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, for any fact or act as to which he was required to testify, excepting that he might be subjected to prosecution for perjury committed while so testifying. January 24, 1862 (c. 11, 12 Stat. 333), Congress modified the immunity provision in particulars not material here. These enactments are now embodied in sections 101–104 and 859 of Revised Statutes. They show very plainly that Congress intended thereby (a) to recognize the power of either House to institute inquiries and exact evidence touching subjects within its jurisdiction and on which it was disposed to act; [17] (b) to recognize that such inquiries may be conducted through committees; (c) to subject defaulting and contumacious witnesses to indictment and punishment in the courts, and thereby to enable either House to exert the power of inquiry "more effectually"; [18] and (d) to open the way for obtaining evidence in such an inquiry, which otherwise could not be obtained, by exempting witnesses required to give evidence therein from criminal and penal prosecutions in respect of matters disclosed by their evidence.

Four decisions of this Court are cited and more or less relied on, and we now turn to them.

The first decision was in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat. 204). The question there was whether, under the Constitution, the House of Representatives has power to attach and punish a person other than a Member for contempt of its authority—in fact, an attempt to bribe one of its Members. The Court regarded the power as essential to the effective exertion of other powers expressly granted, and therefore as implied. The argument advanced to the contrary was that as the Constitution expressly grants to each House power to punish or expel its own Members and says nothing about punishing others, the implication or inference, if any, is that power to punish one who is not a Member is neither given nor intended. The Court answered this by saying:

"There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument, a grant of powers which does not draw after it others, not expressed, but vital to their exercise; not substantive and independent, indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate" (p. 225).

"This argument proves too much; for its direct application would lead to annihilation of almost every power of Congress. To enforce its laws upon any subject without the sanction of punishment is obviously impossible. Yet there is an express grant of power to punish in one class of cases and one only, and all the punishing power exercised by Congress in any cases, except those which relate to piracy and offenses against the laws of nations, is derived from implication. Nor did the idea ever occur to any one, that the express grant in one class of cases repelled the assumption of the punishing power in any other. The truth is, that the exercise of the powers given over their own Members, was of such a delicate nature, that a constitutional provision became necessary to assert or communicate it. Constituted, as that body is, of the delegates of confederated States, some such provision was necessary to guard against their mutual jealousy, since every proceeding against a Representative would indirectly affect the honor of interests of the State which sent him" (p. 233).

The next decision was in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U.S. 168). The question there was whether the House of Representatives had exceeded its power in directing one of its committees to make a particular investigation. The decision was that it had. The principles announced and applied in the case are—that neither House of Congress possesses a "general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen"; that the power actually possessed is limited to inquiries relating to matters of which the particular House "has jurisdiction" and in respect of which it rightfully may take other action; that if the inquiry relates to "a matter wherein relief or redress could be had only by a judicial proceeding" it is not within the range of this power, but must be left to the courts, conformably to the constitutional separation of governmental powers; and that for the purpose of determining the essential character of the inquiry recourse may be had to the resolution or order under which it is made. The court examined the resolution which was the basis of the particular inquiry, and ascertained therefrom that the inquiry related to a private real-estate pool or partnership in the District of Columbia. Jay Cooke & Co. had had an interest in the pool, but had become bankrupts, and their estate was in course of administration in a Federal bankruptcy court in Pennsylvania. The United States was one of their creditors. The trustee in the bankruptcy proceeding had effected a settlement of the bankrupts' interest in the pool, and of course his action was subject to examination and approval or disapproval by the bankruptcy court. Some of the creditors, including the United States, were dissatisfied with the settlement. In these circumstances, disclosed in the preamble, the resolution directed the committee "to inquire into the matter and history of said real estate pool and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in said settlement, with power

[16] The reference is to the power of the particular House to deal with the contempt. In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661, 671–672).

[17] In construing section 1 of the act of 1857 as reproduced in section 102 of the Revised Statutes, this Court said in In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661, 667):

"It is true that the reference is to 'any' matter under inquiry, and so on, and it is suggested that this is fatally defective because too broad and unlimited in its extent; but nothing is better settled than that statutes should receive a sensible construction, such as will effectuate the legislative intention, and, if possible, so as to avoid an unjust or an absurd conclusion, Lau Ow Bew v. United States (144 U.S. 47, 59); and we think that the word 'any', as used in these sections, refers to matters within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress, before them for consideration and proper for their action; to questions pertinent thereto; and to facts or papers bearing thereon."

[18] This Court has said of the act of 1857 that "it was necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in Congress and in each House thereof," (In re Chapman (166 U.S. 661, 671).)

to send for persons and papers and report to the House." The court pointed out that the resolution contained no suggestion of contemplated legislation; that the matter was one in respect to which no valid legislation could be had; that the bankrupts' estate and the trustee's settlement were still pending in the bankruptcy court; and that the United States and other creditors were free to press their claims in that proceeding. And on these grounds the court held that in undertaking the investigation "the House of Representatives not only exceeded the limit of its own authority, but assumed power which could only be properly exercised by another branch of the Government, because it was in its nature clearly judicial."

The case has been cited at times, and is cited to us now, as strongly intimating, if not holding, that neither House of Congress has power to make inquiries and exact evidence in aid of contemplated legislation. There are expressions in the opinion which, separately considered, might bear such an interpretation; but that this was not intended is shown by the immediately succeeding statement (p. 189) that "This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case because we are able to decide the case without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function."

Next in order is In re Chapman, 166 U.S. 661. The inquiry there in question was conducted under a resolution of the Senate and related to charges, published in the press, that Senators were yielding to corrupt influences in considering a tariff bill then before the Senate and were speculating in stocks the value of which would be affected by pending amendments to the bill. Chapman appeared before the committee in response to a subpena, but refused to answer questions pertinent to the inquiry, and was indicted and convicted under the act of 1857 for his refusal. The Court sustained the constitutional validity of the act of 1857, and, after referring to the constitutional provision empowering either House to punish its Members for disorderly behavior and by a vote of two-thirds to expel a Member, held that the inquiry related to the integrity and fidelity of Senators in the discharge of their duties, and therefore to a matter "within the range of the constitutional powers of the Senate" and in respect of which it could compel witnesses to appear and testify. In overruling an objection that the inquiry was without any defined or admissible purpose, in that the preamble and resolution made no reference to any contemplated expulsion, censure, or other action by the Senate, the Court held that they adequately disclosed a subject matter of which the Senate had jurisdiction, that it was not essential that the Senate declare in advance what it meditated doing, and that the assumption could not be indulged that the Senate was making the inquiry without a legitimate object.

The case is relied on here as fully sustaining the power of either House to conduct investigations and exact testimony from witnesses for legislative purposes. In the course of the opinion (p. 671) it is said that disclosures by witnesses may be compelled constitutionally "to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legitimate functions, and that it was to effect this that the act of 1857 was passed"; and also "We grant that Congress could not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the essential and inherent power to punish for contempt, in cases to which the power of either House properly extended; but, because Congress, by the act of 1857, sought to aid each of the Houses in the discharge of its constitutional functions, it does not follow that any delegation of the power in each to punish for contempt was involved." The terms "legitimate functions" and "constitutional functions" are broad and might well be regarded as including the legislative function, but as the case in hand did not call for any expression respecting that function, it hardly can be said that these terms were purposely used as including it.

The latest case is Marshall v. Gordon (243 U.S. 521). The question there was whether the House of Representatives exceeded its power in punishing, as for a contempt of its authority, a person—not a member—who had written, published, and sent to the chairman of one of its committees an ill-tempered and irritating letter respecting the action and purposes of the committee. Power to make inquiries and obtain evidence by compulsory process was not involved. The Court recognized distinctly that the House of Representatives has implied power to punish a person not a member for contempt, as was ruled in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, but held that its action in this instance was without constitutional justification. The decision was put on the ground that the letter, while offensive and vexatious, was not calculated or likely to affect the House in any of its proceedings or in the exercise of any of its functions—in short, that the act which was punished as a contempt was not of such a character as to bring it within the rule that an express power draws after it others which are necessary and appropriate to give effect to it.

While these cases are not decisive of the question we are considering, they definitely settle two propositions which we recognize as entirely sound and having a bearing on its solution. One, that the two Houses of Congress, in their separate relations, possess not only such powers as are expressly granted to them by the Constitution, but such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to make the express powers effective; and, the other, that neither house is invested with general power to inquire into private affairs and compel disclosures, but only with such limited power of inquiry as is shown to exist when the rule of constitutional interpretation just stated is rightly applied. The latter proposition has further support in Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Commission (211 U.S. 407, 417–419), and Federal Trade Commission v. American Tobacco Company (264 U.S. 298, 305–306).

With this review of the legislative practice, congressional enactments and court decisions, we proceed to a statement of our conclusions on the question.

We are of opinion that the power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function. It was so regarded and employed in American legislatures before the Constitution was framed and ratified. Both Houses of Congress took this view of it early in their history—the House of Representatives with the approving votes of Mr. Madison and other Members whose service in the Convention which framed the Constitution gives special significance to their action—and both Houses have employed the power accordingly up to the present time. The acts of 1798 and 1857, judged by their comprehensive terms, were intended to recognize the existence of this power in both Houses and to enable them to employ it more effectually than before. So, when their practice in the matter is appraised according to the circumstances in which it was begun and to those in which it has been continued, it falls nothing short of a practical construction, long continued, of the constitutional provisions respecting their powers, and therefore should be taken as fixing the meaning of those provisions, if otherwise doubtful.[19]

We are further of opinion that the provisions are not of doubtful meaning, but, as was held by this Court in the cases we have reviewed, are intended to be effectively exercised, and therefore to carry with them such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to that end. While the power to exact information in aid of the legislative function was not involved in those cases, the rule of interpretation applied there is applicable here. A legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information respecting the conditions which the legislation is intended to affect or change; and where the legislative body does not itself possess the requisite information—which not infrequently is true—recourse must be had to others who do possess it. Experience has taught that mere requests for such information often are unavailing, and also that information which is volunteered is not always accurate or complete; so some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed. All this was true before and when the Constitution was framed and adopted. In that period the power of inquiry—with enforcing process—was regarded and employed as a necessary and appropriate attribute of the power to legislate—indeed, was treated as inhering in it. Thus there is ample warrant for thinking, as we do, that the constitutional provisions which commit the legislative function to the two Houses are intended to include this attribute to the end that the function may be effectively exercised.

The contention is earnestly made on behalf of the witness that this power of inquiry, if sustained, may be abusively and oppressively exerted. If this be so, it affords no ground for denying the power. The same contention might be directed against the power to legislate, and of course would be unavailing. We must assume, for present purposes, that neither House will be disposed to exert the power beyond its proper bounds, or without due regard to the rights of witnesses. But if, contrary to this assumption, controlling limitations or restrictions are disregarded, the decisions in Kilbourn v. Thompson and Marshall v. Gordon point to admissible measures of relief. And it is a necessary deduction from the decisions in Kilbourn v. Thompson and In re Chapman that a witness rightfully may refuse to answer where the bounds of the power are exceeded or the questions are not pertinent to the matter under inquiry.

We come now to the question whether it sufficiently appears that the purpose for which the witness's testimony was sought was to obtain information in aid of the legislative function. The court below answered the question in the negative and put its decision largely on this ground, as is shown by the following excerpts from its opinion (299 Fed. 638, 639, 640):

"It will be noted that in the second resolution the Senate has expressly avowed that the investigation is in aid of other action than legislation. Its purpose is to 'obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper.' This indicates that the Senate is contemplating the taking of action other than legislative, as the outcome of the investigation, at least the possibility of so doing. The extreme personal cast of the original resolutions; the spirit of hostility toward the then Attorney General which they breathe; that it was not avowed that legislative action was had in view until after the action of the Senate had been challenged; and that the avowal then was coupled with an avowal that other action was had in view—are calculated to create the impression that the idea of legislative action being in contemplation was an afterthought.

"That the Senate has in contemplation the possibility of taking action other than legislation as an outcome of the investigation, as thus expressly avowed, would seem of itself to invalidate the entire proceeding.

[19] Stuart v. Laird (1 Cranch 299, 309); Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat, 304, 351); Ames v. Kansas (111 U.S. 449, 469); Knowlton v. Moore (178 U.S. 41, 56, 92); Fairbank v. United States (181 U.S. 283, 306, et seq.).

But, whether so or not, the Senate's action is invalid and absolutely void, in that, in ordering and conducting the investigation, it is exercising the judicial function, and power to exercise that function, in such a case as we have here, has not been conferred upon it expressly or by fair implication. What it is proposing to do is to determine the guilt of the Attorney General of the shortcomings and wrongdoings set forth in the resolutions. It is 'to hear, adjudge, and condemn.' In so doing it is exercising the judicial function.

"What the Senate is engaged in doing is not investigating the Attorney General's office; it is investigating the former Attorney General. What it has done is to put him on trial before it. In so doing it is exercising the judicial function. This it has no power to do."

We are of opinion that the court's ruling on this question was wrong, and that it sufficiently appears, when the proceedings are rightly interpreted, that the object of the investigation and of the effort to secure the witness's testimony was to obtain information for legislative purposes.

It is quite true that the resolution directing the investigation does not in terms avow that it is intended to be in aid of legislation; but it does show that the subject to be investigated was the administration of the Department of Justice, whether its functions were being properly discharged or were being neglected or misdirected, and particularly whether the Attorney General and his assistants were performing or neglecting their duties in respect of the institution and prosecution of proceedings to punish crimes and enforce appropriate remedies against the wrongdoers—specific instances of alleged neglect being recited. Plainly the subject was one on which legislation could be had and would be materially aided by the information which the investigation was calculated to elicit. This becomes manifest when it is reflected that the functions of the Department of Justice, the powers and duties of the Attorney General and the duties of his assistants, are all subject to regulation by congressional legislation, and that the Department is maintained and its activities are carried on under such appropriations as in the judgment of Congress are needed from year to year.

The only legitimate object the Senate could have in ordering the investigation was to aid it in legislating; and we think the subject matter was such that the presumption should be indulged that this was the real object. An express avowal of the object would have been better; but in view of the particular subject matter was not indispensable. In the Chapman case, where the resolution contained no avowal, this Court pointed out that it plainly related to a subject matter of which the Senate had jurisdiction, and said, "We cannot assume on this record that the action of the Senate was without a legitimate object," and also that "it was certainly not necessary that the resolutions should declare in advance what the Senate meditated doing when the investigation was concluded" (166 U.S. 669–670). In People v. Keeler (99 N.Y. 463), where the Court of Appeals of New York sustained an investigation ordered by the senate of that State where the resolution contained no avowal, but disclosed that it definitely related to the administration of a public office the duties of which were subject to legislative regulation, the court said (pp. 485, 487): "Where public institutions under the control of the State are ordered to be investigated it is generally with the view of some legislative action respecting them, and the same may be said in respect of public officers." And again: "We are bound to presume that the action of the legislative body was with a legitimate object if it is capable of being so construed, and we have no right to assume that the contrary was intended."

While we rest our conclusion respecting the object of the investigation on the grounds just stated, it is well to observe that this view of what was intended is not new, but was shown in the debate on the resolution.[20]

Of course, our concern is with the substance of the resolution and not with any nice questions of propriety respecting its direct reference to the then Attorney General by name. The resolution, like the charges which prompted its adoption, related to the activities of the department while he was its supervising officer; and the reference to him by name served to designate the period to which the investigation was directed.

We think the resolution and proceedings give no warrant for thinking the Senate was attempting or intending to try the Attorney General at its bar or before its committee for any crime or wrongdoing. Nor do we think it a valid objection to the investigation that it might possibly disclose crime or wrongdoing on his part.

The second resolution—the one directing that the witness be attached—declares that his testimony is sought with the purpose of obtaining "information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper." This avowal of contemplated legislation is in accord with what we think is the right interpretation of the earlier resolution directing the investigation. The suggested possibility of "other action" is deemed "necessary or proper" is, of course, open to criticism in that there is no other action in the matter which would be within the power of the Senate. But we do not assent to the view that this indefinite and untenable suggestion invalidates the entire proceeding. The right view, in our opinion, is that it takes nothing from the lawful object avowed in the same resolution and rightly inferable from the earlier one. It is not as if an inadmissible or unlawful object were affirmatively and definitely avowed.

We conclude that the investigation was ordered for a legitimate object; that the witness wrongfully refused to appear and testify before the committee and was lawfully attached; that the Senate is entitled to have him give testimony pertinent to the inquiry, either at its bar or before the committee; and that the district court erred in discharging him from custody under the attachment.

Another question has arisen which should be noticed. It is whether the case has become moot. The investigation was ordered and the committee appointed during the 68th Congress. That Congress expired March 4, 1925. The resolution ordering the investigation in terms limited the committee's authority to the period of the 68th Congress; but this apparently was changed by a later and amendatory resolution authorizing the committee to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable or necessary.[21] It is said in "Jefferson's Manual": [22] "Neither House can continue any portion of itself in any parliamentary function beyond the end of the session without the consent of the other two branches. When done, it is by a bill constituting them commissioners for the particular purpose." But the context shows that the reference is to the two Houses of Parliament when adjourned by prorogation or dissolution by the King. The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives whose Members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it cannot well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says: "The Senate, as a continuing body, may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress"; [23] and, after quoting the above statement from Jefferson's Manual, he says: "The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of a Congress."[24] So far as we are advised the select committee having this investigation in charge has neither made a final report nor been discharged; nor has it been continued by an affirmative order. Apparently its activities have been suspended pending the decision of this case. But, be this as it may, it is certain that the committee may be continued or revived now by motion to that effect, and, if continued or revived, will have all its original powers.[25] This being so, and the Senate being a continuing body, the case cannot be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense. The situation is measurably like that in Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (219 U.S. 498, 514–516), where it was held that a suit to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission did not become moot through the expiration of the order where it was capable of repetition by the Commission and was a matter of public interest. Our judgment may yet be carried into effect and the investigation proceeded with from the point at which it apparently was interrupted by reason of the habeas corpus proceedings. In these circumstances we think a judgment should be rendered as was done in the case cited.

What has been said requires that the final order in the district court discharging the witness from custody be reversed.

Final order reversed.

Mr. Justice Stone did not participate in the consideration or decision of the case.

[20] Senator George said: "It is not a trial now that is proposed, and there has been no trial proposed save the civil and criminal actions to be instituted and prosecuted by counsel employed under the resolution giving to the President the power to employ counsel. We are not to try the Attorney General. He is not to go upon trial. Shall we say the legislative branch of the Government shall stickle and halt and hesitate because a man's public reputation, his public character, may suffer because of that legislative action? Has not the Senate power to appoint a committee to investigate any department of the Government, any department supported by the Senate in part by appropriations made by the Congress? If the Senate has the right to investigate the department, is the Senate to hesitate, is the Senate to refuse to do its duty merely because the public character or the public reputation of someone who is investigated may be thereby smirched, to use the term that has been used so often in the debate? * * * It is sufficient for me to know that there are grounds upon which I may justly base my vote for the resolution; and I am willing to leave it to the agent created by the Senate to proceed with the investigation fearlessly upon principle, not for the purpose of trying but for the purpose of ascertaining facts which the Senate is entitled to have within its possession in order that it may properly function as a legislative body." RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow morning, at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 10 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Friday, January 9, 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9, 1959

(Legislative day of Thursday, January 8, 1959)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, before whose eyes the ages pass, apart from Thee all the schemes of our devising are as futile as a painted ship upon a painted ocean.

In the midst of things as they are, so tangled and tragic, we thank Thee for stirrings of discontent within us, for visions of a glory yet to transfigure the earth, for the rainbow arch across the stormy sky, with its hope of brotherhood and justice and abiding peace.

For our Nation we pray. Upon our President and all who counsel with him, upon the Congress, and upon all who represent our strength, administer our responsibilities, and are entrusted with power to work weal or woe on the earth, we ask Thy sustaining grace. Above all other acclaim or reward, we crave the assurance of Thy approving "well done." "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God."

We ask it in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 8, 1959, was dispensed with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, as I open my remarks on the question of changing rule XXII of the Senate rules, I wish to bring these somber words to the attention of the Senate:

> Someday freedom may depend on a Senate filibuster.

Yes, Mr. President, someday freedom may depend on a Senate filibuster.

Mr. President, the words I have quoted are the title to the lead editorial of the January 3, 1959, issue of the Saturday Evening Post, one of the Nation's leading liberal magazines. The title of the editorial presents a brief, concise, accurate, and straightforward reason or argument why we should protect, and not change, the freedom of unlimited debate in the United States Senate.

For the benefit of the Senate, Mr. President, I shall now read the editorial from the Saturday Evening Post. The editorial was written by Draper Phillips:

SOMEDAY FREEDOM MAY DEPEND ON A SENATE FILIBUSTER

The Democratic liberals are swooping down upon the Senate's rule 22, which protects free debate in the Senate. If they are successful, they will have knocked down a bulwark of the States against complete national control of local affairs. They will have destroyed a fortress which has prevented many efforts of the majority to tyrannize over the minority.

Those who would limit debate to the wishes of the Senate's majority profess to speak in the sacred name of civil rights. Actually, the filibuster has been used scores of times by minorities of all parties and from every section of the country to defeat bills which were repugnant to localities, or were regarded as in violation of a State's constitutional rights. Even majorities have used free debate to prevent minorities from defeating legislation. A majority filibuster in 1917 was at least partly responsible for the establishment of the cloture rule under which two-thirds of the Senators may limit debate.

Senators Elihu Root and Henry Cabot Lodge looked upon the filibuster as a defense weapon against repressive majorities. Their threatened use of it was sufficient to force reconsideration of an appropriation for new post-office construction. Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, recalled that the prolonged debate against the force bill in 1890, which would have authorized Federal supervision of elections, actually altered the opinion of the majority which had proposed the bill. Progressive Senator La Follette, who held the all-time record for an individual filibuster until Senator WAYNE MORSE broke it in a filibuster which he refused to describe as a filibuster—

But I believe he now calls it a filibuster.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I do not know whether at times I have actually filibustered but have said I was not filibustering. I believe I am the only liberal who not only filibusters, but defends the purpose for which I filibuster; and that purpose was quite different from the purpose for which my good friend from South Carolina filibusters.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Of course we disagree on that point. But we do agree that we filibuster in order to enlighten the public.

Mr. MORSE. Oh, yes; on that point we are in agreement.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Yes; we are in agreement on that.

Mr. President, I read further from the editorial:

> [He] offered to fight any cloture that would limit free and unlimited debate. Walter Lippmann, in opposing cloture in 1949, said the real issue is whether any majority, even of two-thirds, shall assume power to override the opposition of a large minority of the States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the editorial, which deals with the same line of thought, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remainder of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We need have no real fear that vital national legislation will be defeated by the filibuster. If the whole people want a law badly enough, it will be passed in spite of delaying tactics. Thus, when Senator Herbert Lehman led a small group in 1952 to filibuster against the important national-origins quota system for admission of immigrants, the filibusterers were quickly routed. The vast majority in nearly every section of the country wanted the law and they got it.

The liberals, in their zeal to secure the vote of, or to protect, the Negro in his civil rights, ignore history. Our Federal system was founded on the principle that the Senate represents the States, not a majority of the people of the Nation. Conditions vary among the States and among groups of States. The advantage of a Federal system over a national system of government is that we can accommodate ourselves to these variations. That was the reason for allowing equal representation in the Senate and unlimited debate.

We ought to count 10 before changing the Senate rules to limit debate substantially. Such a change would rival F. D. R.'s court-packing bill as a challenge to established concepts of government. It required hard work by leaders in both parties and unlimited debate to dispel that threat. It is to be hoped that there are enough Senators left with sufficient courage to resist this politically tempting assault on an important bulwark of the Federal structure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield briefly to me?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from South Carolina will soon conclude his remarks. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of his remarks, the time remaining between then and 11:30 a.m. be divided equally between the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, it is my intention not to speak at length at this time. I have prepared very extended remarks in regard to this particular matter, in which I am vitally interested. But at this time, in view of the agreement made in the Senate, I have agreed to make my discourse very brief.

In view of the editorial I have read, I believe it is obvious that even such northern publications as the Saturday Evening Post are alarmed over the attacks now being made upon our sound and proven democratic processes and today especially on our rule XXII in the Senate, but, aside from the final and most important reasoning set forth in the Saturday Evening Post editorial for maintaining rule XXII, there are other reasons for not changing our rules.

One of the base arguments made against our keeping Senate rule XXII, and, for that matter, any other Senate rule, is that the Senate is not a continuing body and therefore a majority of the Senate present each new session should adopt new rules.

This has been discounted in and out of the Senate since the first day our Government was founded.

For example, on page 29 of Senate Document No. 4 of the 83d Congress, 1st session, is reported debate on this question in the Senate in 1841:

CONTROVERSY OVER THE SENATE PRINTERS IN 1841

A joint resolution of March 3, 1819, had provided that "as soon as this resolution shall have been approved by the President of the United States, each House shall proceed to ballot for a printer, to execute its work during the next Congress." (The resolution is reprinted in Congressional Globe, 26th Cong., 2d sess., vol. 9, p. 238.)

An amendatory joint resolution adopted in 1829 provided that "within 30 days before the adjournment of every Congress, each House shall proceed to vote for a printer to execute its work for and during the succeeding Congress." (Reprinted ibid., p. 189.) Accordingly, on February 20, 1841, during the 2d session of the 26th Congress, the Senate elected Blair and Rives as its printers for the 27th Congress. (Ibid., p. 197.)

On March 4, 1841, the political complexion of the Senate changed. (Ibid., p. 186.) The Senate organized by reelecting its President pro tempore; (ibid., p. 231), and sat in special session until March 14. The House of Representatives duly adjourned sine die, and was not in session after March 4.

On March 4, 1841, a resolution was introduced "that Blair and Rives be dismissed as printers of the Senate for the 27th Congress." (Ibid., p. 236.) On March 5 a motion to take up this resolution for consideration was debated at length. In February, at the time of the election of the printers, it had been urged that the "next Senate" should be allowed to elect its own printers. (Ibid., p. 186.)

Mr. Allen, of Ohio:

"And as to the assertion that this was a new Senate, he denied the fact. The argument so much relied on in this discussion and on which so much logic and reasoning had been wasted in opposition to the election of these printers was untrue. There was no such thing as a new Senate known to the Constitution of this Republic. They might as well speak of a new Supreme Court as of a new Senate. There was a new House of Representatives because the entire House expired at the expiration of the second year and because the 4th of March terminated the life of that body. But not so the Senate. The Constitution replenishes that body every 2 years by the election of a class of Senators, and thereby gives eternity to the duration of the body. There was no new, nor was there any old, Senate. The same Senate, therefore, which elected Blair and Rives now without charge or allegation proposes to rescind the act, but he would not go into that." (Ibid., p. 236.)

Mr. Wright of New York (as the Senate was in special session and the House of Representatives was not sitting, the Senate could properly consider no other business than nominations and treaties):

"He had never heard it pretended that the rules of the Senate are not perpetual from Congress to Congress, unless they were changed by the body. The rules were not now changed; and what, then, were they doing? Why, they were debating this matter in violation of their rules, and by their action were assuming to exercise legislative powers." (Ibid., p. 236.)

* * * * *

James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, contended that the printers were not officers of the Senate, but were entitled under a binding contract to do the Senate printing. But what if they were officers?

"Senators had contended that one Senate or one Congress had no right to elect officers for their successors; and that, therefore, the joint resolution violated the Constitution, because it gave the election of a printer for the next Senate to that which had expired on the 3d of March. This was as strange a position as any which had been assumed throughout the argument. An old Senate and a new Senate.

"There could be no new Senate. This was the very same body, constitutionally and in point of law, which had assembled on the first day of its meeting in 1789. It has existed without any intermission from that day until the present moment, and would continue to exist as long as the Government should endure. It was emphatically a permanent body. Its rules were permanent and were not adopted from Congress to Congress like those of the House of Representatives. For many years after the commencement of the Government its Secretary was a permanent officer, though our rules now require that he should be elected at stated intervals. The Senate always had a President, and there were always two-thirds of its actual Members in existence, and generally a much greater number. It would be useless to labor this question. Every writer, without exception, who had treated on the subject had declared the Senate to be a permanent body. It never dies; and it was the sheet anchor of the Constitution on account of its permanency. Senators were thus deprived of the poor apology that one Senate had no right to bind its successors." (Ibid., p. 240.)

On page 34 of the same document, debate concerning joint rules of Senate and House, made on January 10, 1876, the following appears:

Senator Hamlin, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 4, p. 309):

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session."

Senator Hamlin, in supporting the resolution, said:

"The Senate has its rules. The Senate is an existing body, and its rules exist with the body. The House of Representatives is a body which expires once in 2 years, and its rules expire, of course, with each expiring Congress."

Senator Bayard, speaking on the same resolution January 17, 1976, said (ibid., p. 431):

The question comes at once whether a joint rule adopted by the two Houses falls and becomes void by the expiration of the Congress in which that rule was adopted. So far as the Senate is concerned, it will not, I think, be suggested, because this is a continuing body; there is always and at all times a quorum continuing from one Congress to another. It is not so with the House of Representatives, the termination of whose legal existence is at the end of every 2 years. * * * So far as the Senate is concerned, we all know that the Senate's rules continue, but the question is what effect the different constitution of the other House of Congress has upon a joint rule."

Upon a joint rule Senator Kelly said, as appears on page 35 of the document (Ibid., p. 434):

"The Senate has never considered it necessary to adopt the rules of a previous Congress, probably for the reason which has been stated, that it is always an organized body; that is, it always has a quorum to do business. Being an organized body it has never since 1789 adopted the rules of a previous Congress."

Senator Morton said (Ibid., p. 435):

"I have always understood the theory of the two Houses to be this: First, that the Senate is a continuing body. That results from the nature of its organization and also because it is a part of the executive department of the Government. * * * When the Senate adjourns from one session to another it is nothing more than a recess of the Senate. I believe I have never before heard it said that the House of Representatives was a continuing body. * * * We have a President pro tempore, a Sergeant at Arms, and a Secretary, and they continue until the Senate itself makes a change. Therefore the organization of the body is not lost, and every adjournment of the Senate is simply in the nature of a recess."

Senator Maxey said (Ibid., p. 438):

"It is said that the House of Representatives is a continuous body; and that reason is assigned by a Senator for whose legal judgment I have great respect; but I do not concur in it; I do not think it is true. I believe that there is a cessation of the organization of the House of Representatives every 2 years. The very fact that this body requires the President of the Senate (whoever that may be) to call the Senate together, that it is a perpetual body, that it never ceases to exist, that while one-third goes out every second year one-third comes in at the same time, makes it a perpetual body. * * *

"There never has been a time since the organization of this Government that two-thirds of the Senate were not in existence. It is, therefore, a perpetual body, so laid down in all the works on the subject. The House is not so. It is true of the House of Lords; it is not true of the House of Commons. Precisely what is true of the House of Lords is true of the Senate; precisely what is true of the House of Commons is true of the House of Representatives." (Edgerton, April 30, 1915; McClenon, November 22, 1915.)

The weight of legal precedent, custom, and practice support the view that the Senate of the United States is a "continuing body." So viewed, its rules, in effect in one form or another since the first Senate assembled in 1789, cannot and should not be changed with each new Congress.

Although it is recognized that the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings"—article I, section 5—this does not mean that new rules must be adopted at each new Congress, and that has not been the practice in the past.

Those who argue that previous Senates have merely acquiesced in the rules already existing, and have in actuality readopted them by tacit consent while in the process of organizing themselves, overlook the fact that, when a new Congress opens, the Senate of that Congress is not a completely new body, like the House of Representatives, but, historically and constitutionally, a very real part of that first Senate which met in 1789.

Those who support the present Senate rule 22 do not contend that the Senate is without the power to choose the rules by which it is to be governed; they do hold that that particular rule and every other one are the rules that govern the Senate and that they do not cease to operate when one Congress expires, necessitating the adoption of new rules for the next term of Congress. Thus, the Senate may change its rules whenever it so chooses, but it must do so in conformity with the rules that pertain to amendments in the rules, and this is so because the Senate is in constitutional truth a body in continuous being from the time the Constitution went into effect, and has been so down to the present time. That this is so will be demonstrated in the paragraphs to follow:

While there is no direct precedent on the question as to whether the Senate is a continuing body, most of what might be called collateral precedents flowing from the customs and rules of the Senate, as I have previously pointed out from earlier debates and other sources, definitely point to the acceptance of the theory that the Senate is a continuing body.

It has been the custom of the Senate since its organization to begin the operation of each new Congress without readopting or reaffirming its rules and to continue its elected officers from Congress to Congress, except when there has been a change in party control. This hardly bespeaks the idea of the Senate as a completely new body with every Congress.

In addition to these customs, the rules of the Senate and the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 would appear to be predicated upon the underlying concept that the Senate is a continuing body. Senate rule XXV(2) provides that "each standing committee shall continue and have the power to act until their successors are appointed." Section 134 of the Legislative Reorganization Act provides that "each standing committee of the Senate is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses and adjourned periods of the Senate as it deems advisable." It has always been the practice of the Senate to continue in operation its various committees and officers without regard to the expiration of a particular Congress. The Senate gives evidence of its continuous nature when seen in its various "executive" activities, such as the confirmation of Presidential appointments and the ratification of treaties.

These activities it may conduct, when necessary, at special sessions called by the President, according to the Constitution—article II, section 3. Were the Senate not envisaged as a continuing body, we should hardly find the Founding Fathers drafting such a provision. In addition, treaties do not have to be resubmitted to a "new" Senate, although they are customarily treated de novo.

These long-continued, contemporaneous and practical precedents, necessarily predicated on the Senate being a continuing body, must be given great weight—see United States v. State Bank of North Carolina (6 Pet. 29 (1832). A congressional construction of the Constitution which has been followed since the founding of the Federal Government is entitled to great respect—ex parte quirin (317 U.S. 1 (1942)).

There is judicial precedent, also, for the concept of the Senate as a body continuing down to us from the First Congress. In McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U.S. 135 (1926)), the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Senate is a continuing body. The following language of the court is worthy of special note:

[The Senate] is a continuing body whose Members are elected for a term of 6 years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

The highest courts of two States recognize the rule of decision in the McGrain case: Robertson v. State ((Indiana, 1887), 79 N.E. 582), and Swing v. Riley ((California, 1939), 90 p. 2d 313).

Many of the authoritative writers in the field of government have stated categorically that the U.S. Senate is a continuing body.

The Senate had never required reorganization since the beginning of the Government (Lodge, "Senate of the United States," p. 11).

It * * * meets fully organized and provided with rules determining its methods of procedures (Willoughby, "Principles of Legislative Organization and Administration," p. 243).

[It] * * * is a continuing body (Haynes, "Senate of the United States," p. 341). (See IV Hinds Precedents, 4396, 4400, 4404–4405 for similar statements.)

The reasoning of distinguished writers and the unbroken rule followed by the Senate may be considered in determining the meaning of provisions of the Constitution—see Stockton v. McFarland (160 p. 2d 328 (Arizona, 1940)).

Prof. Edward S. Corwin, editor of the annotated volume of the Constitution published by the Library of Congress, says:

The Senate is a continuing body * * * hence its rules remain in force from Congress to Congress except as they are changed from time to time, whereas those of the House are readopted at the outset of each new Congress.

In the writings of Hamilton, Madison, and Jay in "The Federalist Papers," Nos. 59, 62, 64, and 77, a feeling is evidenced that the Senate should be viewed as a stabilizing factor to set off the changes concomitant upon a House of Representatives which changes completely every 2 years, a body which would continue to exist, as a majority, from session to session, despite changes in the lower House. The following excerpts bear especially on the continuing body theory:

Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the appropriation or disappropriation of that body [the Senate] which, from the greater permanency of its own composition (as compared with the office of the Presidency), will in all probability be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government (No. 77, pp. 476–477).

By leaving a considerable residue of the old ones [Senators] in place, uniformity and order, as well as a constant succession of official information, will be preserved (No. 64, p. 402).

In 1954 the Senate voted on the question of censuring the late Senator McCarthy, of Wisconsin. The main legal question involved was whether the Senate was a continuing body. The censure could not have been voted without first adopting the report of the Watkins committee to the effect that the Senate was a continuing body. All of the Democratic Senators and one-half the Republicans voted for this report. This may be of interest when this issue is raised again.

Rule XX is also—and quite naturally—viewed as a protection against dictation by the majority. Legislative independence disappears in exact proportion to the diminishing of deliberation. Cloture is the foundation of machine rule. Once that foundation is established, the mechanics of machine rule will become very simple, and the Senate will pass into the hands of a few "bosses," who could then direct the proceedings of the Senate through the party-caucus method, dispensing favors and patronage to the faithful Members.

Rule XXII insures due deliberation over legislative measures which come before the Senate. The Senate has not only a duty to legislate, but to inform the people on matters of great importance. If measures are rushed through, the public has no chance to deliberate on them, and thus the great factor of public opinion cannot make itself felt on the lawmakers, thus rendering them less responsive to the national will.

It is the special duty of the Senate, sitting in an appellate capacity, carefully to inspect proposed legislation, a duty not readily performed without freedom of debate. In our system of government, where legislation can be gaveled through the House of Representatives at breakneck speed with only scanty debate under special rules framed by a partisan committee, it is essential that one place be left for thoroughgoing debate.

Further, it is the unique function of the Senate to act as a check upon the Executive, a responsibility it could not perform without full freedom of debate; and certainly not if it were not a continuing body. Unrestricted debate in the Senate is the only check upon Presidential and party autocracy. It is justified by the nature of our governmental system of separated powers.

The Senate is the embodiment of that special relationship between the Federal Government and the States created by the Constitution, when it gave certain enumerated powers to the National Government, and reserved the rest to the States.

The Senate is the only place in the Federal governmental structure wherein can be heard the voices of those representing the States as States. Members of the lower House speak as Representatives of special districts within their States and for the interests of those particular localities only.

Senators speak for the State as a whole, as sort of ambassadors from their States to the National Government, and they speak on the basis of that special compromise that went into the adoption of the Federal Constitution, wherein all "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people—amendment X." If the rules and concepts that have guided the Senate since its beginning were to be swept away and new rules adopted at each new Congress, where will these safeguards for the States be? They will be swept out of existence.

If a completely new set of rules were to be adopted at the beginning of each new session of the Senate, then that body might not be able to function for some days or even weeks, parliamentary chaos ensuing.

Furthermore, if the Senate voted, at the beginning of a new Congress, to do away with the existing rules, under what system of rules of the many conflicting ones that exist, would it proceed? There are numerous systems from which to choose, in the framing of none of which did any Member of the Senate have any part. As each new rule would be debatable, an intolerable length of time might well elapse before the Senate could organize. The very argument that the Senate is not a continuing body would lay the groundwork for more bickering and filibusters each session than the Senate, under its existing rules, has seen in its entire history.

It has been argued by those who favor a more liberal cloture rule that the idea of majority rule is inherent in the Constitution and in the democratic way of life. It is no such thing. One of the distinguishing characteristics of our Constitution is the denial of rule by the majority. In order to change the Constitution itself, a three-fourths vote of the States is required. In the Senate, treaties and impeachment proceedings require more than a simple majority vote. These are all safeguards against punitive legislation or unwise, hasty action by a collusion of selfish interests.

It is misleading to compare the Senate with the upper houses of State legislatures, which may not regard themselves as continuing bodies. The Senate is an altogether different body. It was created as the result of a compromise in order to form the Republic. It represents the interests of the States as sovereign entities, as well as their inhabitants, and is bound to protect those interests. This is what the States sought in return for a cession of a portion of their sovereignty to the Federal Government. To hold now that the Senate never was a continuing body and that its rules may be changed every 2 years is to flout the rights of the minority and actually take away a part of that minority's suffrage in the Senate contrary to the Constitution—article V—to the extent that its right to be fully heard would be denied by a diminishing of the cloture rule. A State legislature is an entirely different matter. It was not created under the special conditions that attended the birth of the Republic. A State has its own constitution and may order the procedures in its own legislature as it sees fit. It represents only the people of that particular State.

In the Constitution itself we see evidence that the Founding Fathers thought it desirable that provision be made for dilatory tactics for the protection of the minority. Article I, section 5, provides that at the desire of one-fifth of those present, the yeas and nays of any vote must be entered on the Journal. This is an intentional safeguard allowing the minority to delay proceedings.

Lastly, the use of the so-called filibuster has not wrought the great damage that has been asserted. Of all the legislative measures that it has been used against, all have subsequently been passed and enacted into law with the exception of the Force bill—Federal elections, 1890–91—the armed ship resolution—to arm American merchant ships against German submarines, 1917—the antilynching bills—1922, 1935, 1937–38—the antipoll tax measures—1942, 1944, 1946, 1948—and the fair employment practices bills—1945, 1950. No really meritorious measure has ever been permanently defeated, and many vicious proposals have been killed. The filibuster has killed more bad bills than good ones. They always provide time for a thorough consideration of measures. It is worthy of note that the Senate, without majority cloture, actually passes a larger percentage of bills introduced in that body than does the House of Representatives with cloture.

Mr. President: In essence, we are confronted with a parliamentary situation strikingly similar to that which confronted us in the Senate in January of 1957. It is urged with great sincerity that the rules of the Senate require a change in order to promote the rule of the majority. It is argued with great feeling that the present rules of the Senate stifle majority rule. It is contended that democracy in our Government is defeated in instances by the application of the existing Senate rules.

I deny these and the other contentions raised in support of a change in our rules. For 171 years the Senate has succeeded in its legislative efforts under the existing rules. They have on occasion been changed. They have been amended. But the great body of our rules has not been changed. From session to session precedents have been established and are embodied in our procedure so that the Senate has been elevated to its present prestige not only in the estimation of our own people but throughout the countries of the free world.

Mr. President, I want it plainly understood that I oppose any change in the Senate's rules that would reduce the two-thirds constitutional majority vote now necessary to invoke cloture.

I have been tempted to speak at greater length on this subject, but I understand that prior agreements make it necessary for us to conclude this phase of the debate in order that we receive the message from the President on the state of the Union.

That being so, I shall conclude my remarks at this point; but I shall be speaking more in opposition to any change in the Senate's rule 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator from New Mexico controls half of the remaining time and the majority leader half of the remaining time.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, when this matter was before the Senate 2 years ago I voted for the motion to table. Since that time there has been ample opportunity to examine a considerable body of material. In this matter, last year, and, I must assume, all other things being equal at this time, in the absence of any other specific proposal that was not on the horizon at the time, I would support the Anderson proposal. But the situation before us today is entirely different.

I allude to other material. I had opportunity, first of all, to examine the report, or extracts and excerpts from the report submitted by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] early in 1958.

Then, on the 30th of April 1958, there was a very extensive report from the Committee on Rules and Administration.

On August 21, 1958, the individual views of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] were then in printed form.

I think one of the most important statements put forth at the time was a mimeographed copy of what is known as background material, which was subscribed by four distinguished Senators, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], dealing with this whole matter, and setting forth what they had intended to do.

There is an entirely changed picture before us at the present time. First we have before the Senate a new, and a specific resolution. As a matter of fact, there are now four specific resolutions.

One of them, of which I am a cosponsor, I think embodies the view I have cherished for quite a long time. So I intend to vote against the Anderson proposal and to support Senate Resolution 5, which does embody my views.

It seems to me rule XXII was actually the only issue which was before us, and it was the only issue embraced in the background memorandum, which was circulated some time late in the fall.

I shall read from page 4 of that memorandum, because I think it sets forth the case pretty clearly. I intend to insert the whole memorandum in the RECORD, but at the bottom of page 4 appears a paragraph styled, "A Majority Can Change Rule 22 if It Has the Will To Do So," and it reads as follows:

The actual mechanics of obtaining majority rule will be simple enough if the majority of the Senators of the new Congress meeting on January 7, 1959, wills it that way.

On January 7, 1959, a motion, modeled on the 1953 and 1957 motions, will be made to take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

Those supporting the filibuster and opposing new rules will then have two alternatives. They can either (a) raise a point of order against the motion, or (b) move to table it, as Senator Taft did in 1953 and Senator JOHNSON did in 1957.

Then there is a paragraph under the caption, "Proceedings After Defeat of Motion To Table," which reads as follows:

Once the motion to table is defeated, the next vote will be on the adoption of our motion to take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress. Although the opponents of this motion might attempt a filibuster once their motion to table is defeated, such an attempted filibuster could be stopped by moving the previous question under general parliamentary law which would then be applicable.

Then there is this very significant paragraph:

Then once the motion to take up rules is adopted by the Senate, a motion will be made to adopt as the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress, the old rules with a revised rule XXII.

There is nothing in this entire theme that relates to any other rule except rule XXII.

Then there is a paragraph which is styled, "Can Decide on New Rule XXII Later."

So this background data, some 5 or 6 pages in length, applies exclusively to rule XXII. The only interest that it manifested in having a vote on the proposal for the adoption of new rules was that something might be done about rule XXII. I have shared that feeling, and I so stated in December 1958. But in view of all the specific proposals which are before us, including one which embodies my views, I certainly will vote against the Anderson proposal so that we can come to grips with this question directly, and have a vote with the least delay on Senate Resolution 5.

While I find myself frequently in disagreement with the Washington Post and Times Herald, I think the editorial which was published this morning summarizes in admirable fashion the whole situation which is before the Senate at the present time, so in connection with my remarks, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the editorial from today's edition of the Washington Post and Times Herald entitled "Taming the Filibuster," and the "Background Memorandum Concerning Bipartisan Effort To Change Rule XXII at the Opening of the Senate of the 86th Congress," subscribed by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial and memorandum were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMING THE FILIBUSTER

The Senate is being treated to a unique spectacle of a filibuster on behalf of efforts to curb the filibuster. Despite the extended talk by Senator MORSE, who has employed this technique as much as any southerner, all sides in the debate can take satisfaction from the way in which the discussion has moved to the heart of the issue.

There has been virtually universal recognition that the present ineffective cloture provision in rule XXII is sure to be changed and that some means will be adopted for shutting off debate over rules changes themselves, which rule XXII explicitly forbids. Even the strong profilibuster southerners so far have accepted this prospect without the threat of a filibuster of their own on the change itself—though whether Mr. MORSE'S example will stimulate their vocal cords remains to be seen.

In any event, the liberal bloc associated with the proposal of Senator DOUGLAS for cloture by a majority of the Senate will be afforded an opportunity today for a fair vote on the merits. This will come in the motion of Majority Leader JOHNSON to table the motion of Senator ANDERSON to consider new rules. If the Anderson motion survives a tabling motion, then consideration of the Douglas proposal will be in order. If it fails, those who believe with Senator JOHNSON in a more limited cloture rule—cloture by two-thirds of those present and voting, with the provision also applying to debate over rules changes—will have their say on the Johnson proposal to amend the present rule XXII.

The whole procedure is an enormously complex parliamentary maneuver. There has been criticism from the liberal group that Senator JOHNSON was highhanded in moving at the outset to proceed directly to the rule XXII discussion, and then moving for adjournment. Some conservative southerners, on the other hand, find it difficult to stomach even the Johnson proposal (although it makes substantial concession to their fear of tyranny by a bare majority).

But the virtue of Mr. JOHNSON'S move to proceed directly to the rule XXII issue is that it makes possible a vote without first undergoing a long harangue over whether the Senate is a continuing body. This is a question about which there are divisions on all sides. Vice President NIXON'S ruling says in effect that the continuing status of the Senate cannot foreclose the right of a majority to change the rules and to impose cloture on such debate by majority vote. Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment states affirmatively that Senate rules continue unless they are changed, but discussion of this point would come on adoption of the amendment itself rather than as a preliminary necessity.

As we understand it, the principal argument for facing the question now of whether the Senate is a continuing body is to establish the right of a majority to change the rules and impose cloture on rules debate. We agree fully that it is important to establish such a right. It seems to us, however, that this right is now established.

Rule XL, now in existence, says that Senate rules may be amended by a majority at any time. The hitch always has been the inability to apply cloture to debate on rules changes. But the Nixon ruling establishes the right to impose cloture on rules debate, and it will prevail unless it is overturned by a majority vote. In other words, despite the language of Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment, a majority of 50 Senators will be able to bring up a change of the rules on any opening day. The Johnson amendment provides for cloture on debate on rules changes.

That being the case, there is no necessity to consume days in debate over whether the Senate is a continuing body. Senators who wish to change the rules already have been assured the opportunity for a vote.

On the change itself, we believe that psychological considerations in the South, as well as the desirability of protecting large minorities elsewhere (which could on occasion be the more populous States), argue strongly for a requirement of more than a simple majority of the Senate to vote cloture. The argument is especially compelling, it seems to us, when there is no great issue warranting a divisive procedural fight, and when Senate rules clearly can be amended by a majority in the future (with means of imposing cloture on rules debate) if abuses should arise.

For this reason we hope that the Senate will dispose of the Anderson-Douglas plan, will adopt an amendment for cloture by two-thirds of those present and voting, and will move on quickly to the urgent national business which demands united attention.

BACKGROUND MEMORANDUM CONCERNING BIPARTISAN EFFORT TO CHANGE RULE XXII AT THE OPENING OF THE SENATE OF THE 86TH CONGRESS

THE ISSUES AT STAKE ON JANUARY 7, 1959

(1) The success or failure of the efforts that will be made on the opening day of the 86th Congress to end the filibuster and bring majority rule to the Senate may very well determine the outcome of much of the important legislation that will be presented to the new Congress.

For rule XXII is not only the gravedigger of civil rights legislation, it is also the threat under which other vital legislation has been defeated, delayed, or compromised to meet the views of the minority.

It would not be too much to say that what is at stake in the fight for reasonable majority rule to be made at the opening of the new Congress is nothing more nor less than the dignity of the Senate and its ability to function as a democratic and representative legislative body.

The impossible hurdle of 64 votes

(2) The existing rule XXII, adopted in 1949, permits the closing of debate only if two-thirds of the total Senate (not two-thirds of those present and voting) vote affirmatively to close debate. In other words, 64 Senators (66 after Alaska is admitted) must be on the floor and must affirmatively vote for closing debate or a filibuster can continue forever. It has never been possible in the past to obtain such a 64-Senator vote to close debate on any civil rights bill, and there is no reason to believe it will ever be possible in the future.

How rule XXII is designed to perpetuate itself

(3) Furthermore, even this theoretical possibility of closing debate by 64 Senators being present and voting in the affirmative, academic though it is, does not apply to a motion to consider a change in rule XXII itself. Subsection 3 of rule XXII expressly states that the cloture rule (64 votes) shall not apply to any motion to proceed to the consideration of any motion, resolution, or proposal to change any of the Standing Rules of the Senate. Thus, even 90 Senators present and voting cannot close debate on a motion to consider a proposed change in rule XXII. (Although as to constitutionality of this, see discussion of Vice President's opinion in 1957.)

No escape from filibuster rule after rule XXII is accepted

(4) Thus, once the Senate of the 86th Congress meeting in January 1959, accepts rule XXII by acquiescing in the full body of existing rules of the Senate, there is no way of changing rule XXII later on in the session. The possibility of breaking a filibuster against an attempt to bring up a rule change without any applicable cloture provision whatsoever, and then changing rule XXII, is and has proved to be over the years, wholly academic and illusory.

Bitter experiences in last four Congresses

(5) That there is no escape from the filibuster after rule XXII is accepted by the new Congress is shown by what has happened since the present rule XXII was adopted in 1949. Efforts have been made in each of the intervening four Congresses—the 82d, 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses—to change rule XXII. In the 82d and 83d Congresses, a change in rule XXII was favorably reported to the Senate by the Rules Committee, but in both Congresses the threat of a filibuster kept the issue from the floor of the Senate. In the 84th Congress, nothing happened on rule XXII.

In this 85th Congress, the Rules Committee on April 30, 1958, reported out Senate Resolution 17 to amend rule XXII to provide for majority rule after full and fair debate. On July 28, 1958, a bipartisan group of a dozen Senators took the floor and urged action on Senate Resolution 17 at this session. They made it clear that if the proposed rule change were not called up and acted upon at this session, they hoped they would not hear the suggestion made again in January 1959, that action should be deferred until later in the new Senate session.

These experiences, therefore, demonstrate that the only time that this issue can be brought to the floor of the Senate is on opening day of the Senate of a new Congress when there are no existing rules to bind the majority will of the Senate of the new Congress.

Only time to change the rule is at the start of a new Congress

(6) There is one moment and one moment only when this matter can be resolved and that is the moment at which the Senate of the 86th Congress opens on January 7, 1959. At that point, the Senate can proceed under the Constitution and under general principles of parliamentary law, including those set forth in Jefferson's Manual, on the basis that it has no other set rules, and a majority of its Members can adopt any rules of procedure that they deem proper to govern the business of the Senate. Then and then only, by moving the previous question under general parliamentary law, can we hope to close debate and reach a vote on a change in the rules free from the shackles which rule XXII places on the amending process itself.

The Senate's rulemaking power is undiminished

(7) In the past, it has been the practice of the Senate of a new Congress simply to acquiesce in the old rules and thereby make them the rules of the newly convening Senate. In past practice (other than 1917, 1953, and 1957) were followed, nothing would be said about the rules at the opening of the 86th Congress, and the old Senate rules would, by acquiescence, govern the conduct of business of the new Senate.

But the question whether to acquiesce in the old rules or adopt new rules is up to the Senators sitting on January 7, 1959, including those newly elected in 1958; there is no requirement that they acquiesce in the old rules and all the limitations which those rules set upon the rulemaking power itself. The Senate that meets on January 7, 1959, will have the same right to adopt its own rules as the first Senate had to adopt its rules when it met in 1789.

The power is in the Constitution itself

(8) Article I, section 5, of the Constitution, declares that "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings," and there can be no doubt that the Senate of the 86th Congress meeting on January 7, 1959, has this constitutional right just as did the Senate of the First Congress in 1789. The House adopts its rules at the start of each new Congress and does so without any interference with the expeditious handling of its business. The Senate of the 86th Congress, therefore, will clearly have the right to adopt its own rules on January 7, 1959.

Fresh start is made by Senate in each new Congress

(9) In every major activity, the Senate recognizes the constitutional right of the Senate of each new Congress to determine both legislative and executive business anew.

All consideration of bills, resolutions, treaties, and nominations starts at the beginning of each Congress without reference to or continuation of what has taken place in the past. The slate is wiped clean; the proceedings begin again.

The fact that two-thirds of the Senate membership regularly hold over their office from one Congress to the next does not limit the express constitutional grant of power over rules, and it does not eliminate the necessity of starting all business anew in a new Congress. There is no possible reason for any differentiation in the matter of rules or for telling the newly elected Senators that they must accept the fetters which the old rules seek to put upon them.

Continuous body theory, contradicted by Senate practice, cannot perpetuate old rules

(10) The argument will be made that the Senate is a continuous body, and, therefore, the rules automatically carry over from Congress to Congress. But the Senate does not act as a continuous body for bills, resolutions, treaties, nominations, etc.; indeed, it does not act as a continuous body for any known purpose.

The proponents of the continuous body theory are actually arguing completely in a circle; they say that the Senate is a continuous body because the rules carry over from Senate to Senate, and then turn around and argue that the rules should carry over from Senate to Senate because it is a continuous body. As far as is known, this is the only case in American history in which anyone has tried to thwart the will of the majority of the Senate with an adjective.

New Senators must have share in making the rules

(11) Furthermore, even if the Senate could be deemed a continuous body for some unstated purpose, this could not deprive new Senators of the right to participate in making the rules under which they must operate.

Every Senator elected since the adoption of the present rule XXII in 1949, must have restored to him his right to help make the rules to govern his actions.

It becomes an absurdity to argue that rules adopted years or even generations earlier can bind new Senators who are elected on pledges to particular programs which the old rules make impossible. As Thomas Jefferson said:

"Can one generation bind another, and all others, in succession forever? I think not. The Creator has made the earth for the living, not the dead. * * * A generation may bind itself as long as its majority continues in life; when that has disappeared, another majority is in place, holds all the rights and powers their predecessors once held, and may change their laws and institutions to suit themselves. Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent unalienable rights of man."

Issued raised three times in recent history

(12) The question of new rules for the Senate of a new Congress has been raised three times in recent history—in 1917, 1953, and 1957.

Senator Walsh succeeded in 1917

(13) At the opening of the 65th Congress in March 1917, Senators Owen, of Oklahoma, and Walsh, of Montana, raised the question whether the rules of the preceding Senate were binding upon the new body.

Senator Owen, on the first business day, March 6, 1917, refused to permit a bill to be referred to committee on the ground that committees were not in existence at the beginning of this new Congress, and Senator Walsh supported Owen's contention.

On March 7, Senator Walsh presented a resolution squarely raising the issue whether the rules carried over from Senate to Senate and presented his now famous argument against the old rules being applied to the new Senate. Said the Senator: "A majority may adopt the rules in the first place. It is preposterous to assert that they may deny to future majorities the right to change them."

On the evening of March 7, after Senator Walsh's resolution and speech, caucuses of both parties voted to approve a change in rule 22 to provide for cloture by a two-thirds vote. The resolution was debated by unanimous consent without ever being referred to committee, and was adopted on March 8, 1917 (76 yeas, 3 nays). Senator Walsh, who had accomplished his purpose of obtaining the cloture rule he sought, dropped his resolution.

In 1953 opponents avoided head-on debates

(14) The second attempt to deal with the problem of the rules at the opening of a session of Congress was on January 3, 1953, the 1st day of the 83d Congress. On the opening day, Senator ANDERSON, on behalf of himself and Senators Ives, Lehman, Tobey, Green, Humphrey, Hendrickson, Neely, Duff, Pastore, Kilgore, Murray, Mansfield, Magnuson, Jackson, Douglas, Kennedy, Morse, and Hunt moved as follows: "In accordance with article I, section 5, of the Constitution which declares that 'each House may determine the rules of its proceedings,' I now move that this body take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 83d Congress."

Proponents of this motion set forth their arguments in support of the right of the new Senate under the Constitution to adopt its own rules.

Opponents of the resolution refused to meet these arguments head-on; their primary contention was the purely negative one that the continuous Senate had not in the past undertaken to establish new rules at the beginning of each new Congress and, therefore, should not do so now.

The group which opposed the motion to take up consideration of new rules for the newly convened Senate did not raise a point of order against it, a maneuver which would have been the proper one if the group had been sure of the soundness of its position. Vice President Barkley was reported (Newsweek, January 19, 1953) to have been prepared to rule that the Senate could then adopt new rules, like the House. No opposing Senator, however, made any move to get a direct vote on the issue.

Instead, the then majority leader, Senator Taft, avoided such a vote by moving to lay the resolution on the table. As was subsequently pointed out by Senator Lehman, this was an implicit recognition of the fact that the resolution had been in order. The motion to table was passed by a vote of 70 to 21 (this included 18 of those who cosponsored the motion—all except Senator MAGNUSON, who was absent, plus Senators HENNINGS, KUCHEL, and SYMINGTON).

In 1957 opponents again avoided head-on debate

(15) The third attempt to deal with the problem of rule XXII at the opening of Congress occurred on January 3, 1957, the first day of the 85th Congress, when a bipartisan group made the same motion that had been made 4 years earlier. This time the majority leader was Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and on January 4, 1957, he moved to lay the resolution to take up rules on the table. This time, however, 41 Senators, twice as many as in 1953, opposed the motion to table (38 so voted and Senators Wiley, Neely, and Javits announced their position against the motion to table). A switch of only 7 votes in 1959 will defeat the motion to table the proposal to take up rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress. If Alaska is admitted 50 votes will be required.

Vice President Nixon's ruling

(16) During the debate on January 4, 1957, Vice President NIXON, responding to a parliamentary inquiry from Senator HUMPHREY made his position abundantly clear in a brilliant and historic opinion.

While conceding that the method of election of Senators indicated the intention of the framers that the Senate should be a continuing parliamentary body for some purposes, he stated his opinion categorically that "there can be no question that the majority of the new existing membership of the Senate, under the Constitution, have the power to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed." The Vice President then continued:

"It is the opinion of the Chair that while the rules of the Senate have been continued from one Congress to another, the right of a current majority of the Senate at the beginning of a new Congress to adopt its own rules, stemming as it does from the Constitution itself, cannot be restricted or limited by rules adopted by a majority of the Senate in a previous Congress.

"Any provision of Senate rules adopted in a previous Congress which has the expressed or practical effect of denying the majority of the Senate in a new Congress the right to adopt the rules under which it desires to proceed is, in the opinion of the Chair, unconstitutional. It is also the opinion of the Chair that section 3 of rule XXII in practice has such an effect."

A majority can change rule XXII if it has the will to do so

(17) The actual mechanics of obtaining majority rule will be simple enough if the majority of the Senators of the new Congress meeting on January 7, 1959, wills it that way.

On January 7, 1959, a motion, modeled on the 1953 and 1957 motions, will be made to take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress.

Those supporting the filibuster and opposing new rules will then have two alternatives. They can either (a) raise a point of order against the motion, or (b) move to table it, as Senator Taft did in 1953, and Senator JOHNSON did in 1957.

It seems likely that the latter course will be followed a third time. Our opponents will hardly venture a point of order since Vice President NIXON made clear in his answer to Senator HUMPHREY'S parliamentary inquiry that he would rule against any such point of order. Our opponents will undoubtedly prefer to have the significant vote on their motion to table rather than on their appeal from the Vice President's ruling in favor of the proposal to take up rules for the newly convened Senate.

It can, therefore, be assumed that the opponents of our motion will once again seek to table it. Presumably they will allow some reasonable debate before the tabling motion is voted upon. It should be noted, however, that despite the fact that the vote will probably thus come on a motion to table rather than on an appeal from the Vice President's ruling on a point of order, the Vice President has for all practical purposes made clear his view against the tabling motion and a vote to table will in effect be a vote against the Vice President.

The vote on the motion to table will be the first major vote; once we have defeated the motion to table we can proceed to take the necessary action to adopt new rules.

Proceedings after defeat of motion to table

(18) Once the motion to table is defeated, the next vote will be on the adoption of our motion to take up for immediate consideration the adoption of rules for the Senate of the 86th Congress. Although the opponents of this motion might attempt a filibuster once their motion to table is defeated, such an attempted filibuster could be stopped by moving the previous question under general parliamentary law which would then be applicable.

Then once the motion to take up rules is adopted by the Senate, a motion will be made to adopt as the rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress, the old rules with a revised rule XXII. Again any attempted filibuster could be stopped by moving the previous question under general parliamentary law. A majority of the Senate will, at long last, determine the cloture rule by which they desire to be bound.

Can decide on new rule XXII later

(19) It is not necessary to decide at this stage what the new rule XXII should be. If the motion to take up the rules of the Senate is adopted, then, as pointed out in the previous paragraph, a motion would be made to adopt the old rules with a new rule XXII.

The new rule XXII might provide for a limitation on debate if, after 2 days' notice, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting supported cloture or if, after 15 days' notice, a majority of the total Senate (i.e., 49 Senators) supported cloture. This proposal would permit prompt action on emergency measures supported by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting, while, at the same time, it would assure no less than 2—and more likely 4—weeks of debate on legislation before a majority of the total Senate could obtain cloture. Such a proposal is incorporated in Senate Resolution 17 which had extensive hearings during the 85th Congress and thereafter received the approval of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration following thorough committee consideration.

Variations of this new rule XXII will be proposed by various Senators. But this matter can be worked out after the principle has been established that the new Senate has a right to determine its own rules. Certainly, those who believe in the dignity and effective operation of the Senate under majority rule should combine to bring this about.

A new rule XXII can be adopted in January 1959

(20) The attached pages from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 28, 1958, report the unsuccessful effort by our bipartisan group of Senators (see par. (5) above) to get action on rule XXII before the close of the 85th Congress.

They contain additional material about the importance of rule XXII and about the ways and means of bringing about a new rule XXII in January 1959, if you or your staff have time to consider the problem more fully than this memorandum does.

One thing these attached pages will also show you is the determination of our bipartisan group to bring about a new rule XXII in January 1959.

With the help of newly elected Senators of both parties committed to a forward-looking program for the Senate, this effort can and will be successful.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.
HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.
JACOB K. JAVITS.
CLIFFORD P. CASE.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am slightly confused. I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Illinois and for the opinions of many of my other distinguished colleagues. What puzzles me is that Senators who advocate a change of this rule at the same time rave about the United Nations as such a great institution, yet under its charter, one country of the 82 countries in the United Nations has a veto power. There is no talk about changing that, because, as we know, the charter cannot be amended. The advocates of the United Nations, the men who scream about its being a great and glorious institution, know that in its operations one country can overrule 81 others.

I want the distinguished Senator to know I am in favor of retaining rule XXII, because it provides that two-thirds of a constitutional majority of the Senate must act in order to invoke cloture. I should like to have the distinguished Senator explain to me, if he will, the inconsistency between the two situations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must say to my very distinguished friend from North Dakota that the vagaries of the human mind are quite beyond me at times. I often find myself in a position where some of these foibles not only intrigue me, but baffle me, in point of fact.

A case in point would be the views of the very distinguished former and lamented Senator from Nebraska, Mr. George Norris, who, while liberal in so many fields, made an impassioned plea on the Senate floor long ago in behalf of the protection of minorities and the protection of the freedom of debate, so that any subject matter which was of great interest to the people would be adequately ventilated before it came to a vote.

I will go along with the idea of requiring concurrence by two-thirds, because I think it is reasonable. When we include the application of that principle to a modification of rules of the Senate, my approval goes even further. That represents my best thinking. I think the resolution is reasonable. I think it is rational. For that reason I hope it will prevail, and that all the other amendments and motions which are pending will ultimately be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the distinguished Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An additional minute has been yielded.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator mentioned George Norris, who almost single-handedly and alone saved Muscle Shoals. That shows the great value of one objection and what it can do to help the country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It indicates a passionate devotion to freedom of speech and freedom of debate, until all the truth has been sucked out of any proposition before it is resolved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is——

Mr. MANSFIELD and Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico plans to yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished friend for giving me this opportunity to add a few words to the already extensive enlightening debate which we have heard on the question of amending rule XXII, the question of limitation of debate.

Mr. President, I had intended to speak upon this subject at some length. However, I believe the main propositions which bear upon the case have been covered, and I think there is a respectable segment of opinion on the other side.

As a supporter of the motion of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] of which I have the honor to be a cosponsor, I believe that I am doing what I think is right in terms of expediting the business of the Senate.

The Senate has for many years been shackled in its operation by the lack of a workable method to bring debate to a conclusion. As a result, we all know that a determined minority has been able to block completely the passage of some legislation; and in many instances the minority has been able to force substantial compromises, far out of proportion to the number of whichever minority might have been involved.

Mr. President, I have always favored exhaustive debate, so that the Nation, and, indeed even this august body, might be completely informed as to the legislative proposals under consideration and the significance of the enactment of such proposals. However, after a reasonable time, it seems to me that reasonable and thoughtful men should come to a conclusion.

I do not think I am saying anything which will startle any Member of the Senate today when I say that there are very few speeches which change the minds of Senators. We know that the Members have studied the issues—certainly they have studied the important issues—which are presented by the various legislative proposals which come before us; and we know that most Members have made up their minds before they come to the floor to vote.

I recognize also the fact that there are certain aspects of questions which need expansion and which require enlightenment. The distinguished occupant of the chair, the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] will recall that during the closing days of the last Congress some of us made a determined effort to preserve the integrity of the Supreme Court of the United States. We were successful, by a very narrow margin, in defeating all the proposals which came before this body to diminish, constrict, and otherwise impede—and, indeed, possibly degrade—the Supreme Court of the United States before the country and before the world. It is my conviction that in that instance the debate was most helpful.

The distinguished and able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] has taken the lead in this fight upon three occasions. Irrespective of what legislation may ultimately evolve, I think he deserves the warm commendation of the country and of the people for his efforts. Other Senators who have joined with him in exhaustive preparation upon this subject are also entitled to commendation for their efforts, their persistence, and their indefatigable labors.

This is not a simple and easy subject to discuss. We lawyers know that there are many technicalities, both procedural and substantive, which arise to confront us when we discuss any question of the importance of this one.

I believe that we should amend rule XXII. The proposal which I urge upon my colleagues—with great respect to those who do not agree with my point of view—is that debate may be terminated by a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting, 2 days after a motion signed by 16 Senators is presented to the Senate, or by a majority vote of the Senators duly chosen and sworn, 15 days after such motion, signed by 16 Senators, is presented to the Senate. The moving Senators, of course, must adopt one or the other procedure. They have two alternatives. In both instances, however, if the motion is adopted by the Senate, each Senator is entitled to speak for 1 hour before a vote is taken on the pending question.

As we lawyers all know, it is entirely possible to discuss almost anything adequately in an hour's time. The courts of the country limit the time allotted to counsel for argument before juries. I have tried cases involving substantial matters, and in which I have been limited to an argument of an hour, an hour and a half, or 2 hours. In this time, I have reviewed all the evidence, discussed the law, and presented the case to the jury.

It seems to me that the Senate often hears unnecessary, repetitious, redundant, and tautological discussion of some of the issues before it. I believe that one weakness in the present system is that discussions upon legislation are not sufficiently germane, at times, to the pending question. They serve to delay and often frustrate the membership of this body, which is awaiting a vote and an opportunity to reach a conclusion upon subjects which are of great importance to the country and the world.

Senate Resolution 17 of the 85th Congress, of which I had the honor to be a cosponsor, was referred to the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. I happen to be chairman of that committee. At that time I appointed a special committee, composed of the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] and the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], to study the question of amending rule XXII. Those Senators labored diligently and held exhaustive hearings. The hearings were full and complete. Their findings were presented to the full Committee on Rules and Administration. The distinguished Senator from Georgia took a view adverse to the resolution which I am now advocating. The distinguished Senator from New York took a view in harmony with it.

We often talk about regular procedure. It might be of interest to the Senate to know that on April 30, 1958, by a vote of 5 to 4 the Committee on Rules and Administration reported Senate Resolution 17 without amendment. I supported this proposal at that time. I have supported the proposal upon two other occasions. I see no reason to change my views regarding it. I still believe that this is the most constructive, and, indeed, the most workable, cloture rule which could be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). The 10 minutes allocated to the Senator from Missouri have expired.

Mr. HENNINGS. May I have 1 more minute?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield an additional minute to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall rush to a conclusion. I thank the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

It should be noted that the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration had before it at the time it reported Senate Resolution 17, Senate Resolution 30 which required a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting as the only method to bring debate to an end. The committee rejected this proposal.

If the U.S. Senate is to retain the respect and confidence of the country, it must have the capacity to dispose of legislation important to the Nation and the world with reasonable diligence and speed.

Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks, several outstanding editorials and articles on this subject. They are an editorial entitled "New Battle On Filibuster," published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of December 5, 1958; an editorial entitled "Test for the Senate," published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of January 4, 1959; an editorial entitled "The Power of Decision," published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of December 12, 1958; an editorial entitled "The Majority Has Rights Too," published in the New York Times of January 7, 1959; an article entitled "'King Filibuster' Heads the Agenda," which was written by a distinguished Washington reporter, Mr. Robert C. Albright, and which appeared in the Washington Post for November 30, 1958.

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Globe Democrat, Dec. 5, 1958]

NEW BATTLE ON FILIBUSTER

That frustrating anachronism of Capitol Hill tradition, the Senate filibuster, will be the target of a concentrated fight immediately upon the opening of Congress in January. Battle lines are forming and the issue promises a furious engagement.

Almost every new Congress in recent years talks about changing the filibuster rule. Almost every Congress fails. But the prospect for success in 1959 seems brighter as leaders join in what promises to be a bipartisan offensive.

The Senate filibuster—it rarely occurs in the House which has better debate rules—is a most obstructionist device of democratic legislation. It enables a bitter-end minority literally to talk bills to death.

This maneuver, masquerading under the high-sounding principle of unlimited debate, is in reality a gimmick to balk majority rule in Congress and smother legislation by endless windbagging.

It is, of course, not always successful. It too often defeats needed law.

Every intelligent student of democratic government wants to protect the rights of minorities. There also is the profound duty to protect rights of the majority. The filibuster is an insupportable instrument for control by the minority.

Under the Senate rule XXII, cloture or a limit on debate can only be invoked by two-thirds of the constitutional membership of the Senate. Now, with Alaska's Senators, that would mean a cloture vote of 66, practically impossible to obtain.

Another rule says there can be no limitation of debate whatever on changing a session's rules. Senators for decades have held theirs is a continuing session, with no hiatus created by new Congresses. This conceit holds little sense, but it makes it virtually impossible to change the two-thirds rule.

Vice President NIXON has expressed his opinion that the Senate is not a continuing body and so can change its rules at the beginning of a new Congress, by majority ballot, which cannot be balked by filibuster.

Stanch champions of an end for the filibuster hobble will demand such a ruling and are set for a hard-hitting fight to establish cloture rule that could limit debate upon majority vote. The core of this anti-filibuster group is composed of Senator DOUGLAS, Democrat of Illinois; Senator CLIFFORD P. CASE, Republican of New Jersey, and Senator JACOB J. JAVITS of New York.

They are banking in their campaign on the fact that the recent elections brought more liberal Democrats into the Senate. November's influence can also change former antagonism of old Members.

One segment that certainly won't be changed, of course, is the delegation from the solid South, who know a primary reason for pulling teeth from the filibuster is to pass more civil rights legislation.

Evidence already shows a change is being wrought in Senate sentiment. Conservative Senator DIRKSEN, Republican of Illinois, who voted against opening Senate rules to revision in 1957, now asserts he has changed his mind.

Democratic Senate Leader LYNDON JOHNSON was strongly against curbing the filibuster several years ago. Now he proposes a compromise to limit debate by two-thirds of those voting, instead of two-thirds of the whole membership. This plan is acceptable to some southerners, not to Messers. DOUGLAS, CASE, JAVITS, et al.

The filibuster is a bad implement, used by so-called liberals as well as southerners, to block legislation by windjamming, by stultifying talkathons that emasculate decisions of Congress.

No change proposed would obviate adequate debate. None should. But the filibuster is not debate. It is an unconscionable violation of democratic processes.

It should be now and forever abandoned.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Jan. 4, 1959]

TEST FOR THE SENATE

Probably the first, and certainly one of the most important, issues to face the new Senate when it convenes this week will be the question of the filibuster. At present, the votes of 64 Senators—an "absolute two-thirds"—are required to bring debate on any measure to an end—which means that a determined minority can usually block a vote on a measure by talking it to death. Should the rules be changed to permit fewer than 64 Senators to close debate?

We believe the answer is yes, and we believe the new rule should be the one supported by Senator DOUGLAS of Illinois and other liberals in both parties.

Senator DOUGLAS would permit two-thirds of the Senators present to close debate after 2 days; but if debate continued for more than 15 days, it could then be terminated by a majority of Senators on the floor. In actual practice, the Douglas plan would permit a debate to run as long as 8 or 9 weeks—certainly long enough to air the most controversial issue—before a majority could bring the issue to decision.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON is supporting a milder rules change in an effort to head off the Douglas plan. The Democratic majority leader would provide simply that debate could be closed at any time by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Various kinds of arithmetic can be used to argue that this rule would be an improvement. The best answer is that precisely the same rule was in effect in the Senate from 1917 to 1949—and filibusters were no easier to break during that period than they are now.

That is why the Johnson plan is not enough and the Douglas plan should be adopted. Basically, the question is whether the Senate should have the power to come to a decision, or whether a minority should retain the power to block any decision by abusing the privilege of debate.

We cannot agree with Walter Lippmann and others who argue that this minority power to block a decision is a necessary part of our constitutional balance. Plenty of checks and balances exist—in the two-house system, the workings of seniority, the Presidential veto, and the power of judicial review—but the anarchic principle of the filibuster is not and was never meant to be one of them. Nor is it true that the filibuster is needed for the protection of individual rights. The Douglas proposal would permit quite as much protection as individual rights ever get in the Senate—and in addition it would permit the Senate to come to a decision on vital issues of controversy, including civil rights.

Every Senator will be measured by the way he votes on the filibuster this week.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 12, 1958]

THE POWER OF DECISION

As lines form for the Senate fight on the filibuster, that tactic of obstruction is once more being defended as a vital instrument of freedom. The power to paralyze legislation by unlimited talk is described as an essential protection of minorities against the tyrannous majority, a necessary element in the checks and balances of our governmental system.

How much validity is there in these claims? Not much. Minorities are entitled to reasonable protection against the hasty, illegal or oppressive acts of a runaway majority, but they are not entitled to the privilege of paralyzing the legislative process itself. The safeguards which they can legitimately claim are embedded in the structure of our system: in the two branches of Congress, each having a different basis of representation; in the committee system of both branches; in the Executive veto; in the power of judicial review.

To say that all of these very real protections for minority rights come to naught unless a handful of Senators shall have the right to abuse the very nature of parliamentary debate is to abandon all sense of proportion.

The purpose of debate is to enlighten, to inform, to bring out the merits and evils of proposed legislation. None of these ends is served by permitting a Senator to read the telephone book and a shelf full of encyclopedias until his colleagues out of sheer exhaustion give up their right to come to a decision.

The filibuster is not debate. It is an act of coercion. It is as undemocratic as a shillelagh, and the use of it is as disruptive of parliamentary process as would be the defeat of a bill at the point of a gun.

Those who paint the filibuster as a sacred element of our constitutional system neglect to mention some of the facts brought out often by Senator DOUGLAS. The British Parliament, which supplied so many of the precedents for our Congress, has always had machinery for closing debate by a simple majority. The Continental Congress had such machinery. The House has always had it. And the Senate itself not only could but did close debate by majority vote in the first 20 years of its existence. The filibuster was invented, not to protect minorities, but to give a handful of Senators disproportionate power to control legislation.

We think the defenders of the filibuster have damaged their case by offering to accept a rule under which debate can be ended by two-thirds of those attending, instead of two-thirds of the Senate membership as at present. If it is true, as they say, that to alter the filibuster means altering the institutional character of the Senate, then they ought to offer no compromise at all. By temporizing with the growing Senate demand for a change in the rules, they tacitly confess that they are defending not principle but power.

Nobody is contending for any serious strictures upon real debate. The Douglas proposal would allow more than ample time for full discussion of an issue before the majority could move to close debate, and even then each speaker would have an hour for more talk before closure went into effect. What this rule would do is to insure that the Senate could fulfill the ultimate function of every legislative body—to decide.

Is that uncharacteristic of the Senate, dangerous to minorities, or hostile to constitutional balance? If so, then so is democracy.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 7, 1959]

THE MAJORITY HAS RIGHTS TOO

When the Senate organizes for business today it will have before it a proposal by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, supported by other liberal Senators, to permit the majority, after a decent interval for reflection and debate, to get on with the country's business. This proposal is perhaps the most important single subject that will come before either House of the 86th Congress. Senator DOUGLAS and his associates propose that rule XXII be amended so that a simple majority of the whole Senate may impose cloture after 15 days. After this interval debate could continue until each Senator had had an ample chance to speak, but a filibuster could not continue. The whole process of bringing a measure to vote over the opposition of an entrenched minority might take a month or more, but at the end of that time a vote could be had and the majority would prevail.

We admit the existence of honest arguments against this reform. There are those who fear that unwise legislation may be steamrollered through Congress. But the choice seems to us to be between a reasonable delay and a reasonable amount of discussion, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the actual rule of a minority. It is easy to find arguments against what has been called the tyranny of the majority, but the tyranny of the minority is and always has been infinitely worse. For instance, there is no reason under heaven why a minority in the South or anywhere else should prevent this Nation from enacting a modern bill of civil rights.

There will be an effort in the House of Representatives to reduce the power of the Rules Committee, which now is usually able to put bills in the deep freeze and keep them there. This machinery, which the leadership of the lower House controls, has the same result that rule XXII effectuates in the Senate—namely, to prevent bills which a minority dislikes from being brought to the floor at all. But the situation in the House, with SAM RAYBURN in the Speaker's chair, is not as bad as the situation in the Senate with an unamended rule XXII.

The election wave of last November was not merely a Democratic wave, it was also an expression of a reviving liberalism. We shall be deeply disappointed if this liberalism does not reveal itself in a democratic revision of rule XXII.

[From the Washington Post, Nov. 30, 1958]

"KING FILIBUSTER" HEADS THE AGENDA

(By Robert C. Albright)

Is King Filibuster dead or dying? Not yet, perhaps, but the incoming 86th Congress is making elaborate plans for his demise.

Already Capitol Hill liberals are preparing the funeral oration. Some Senate "moderates" are chiseling happily away at his epitaph.

It may take another filibuster by his most devout Senate subjects, to bury King Filibuster. But never in modern times has his rule been so seriously threatened.

Modification of the Senate's highly vulnerable filibuster rules appears indicated as one of the very first acts of the heavily Democratic 86th Congress.

If that seems a sweeping statement, the implications are even more portentous.

It could mean that starting with this Congress it will be increasingly more difficult in the Senate to talk legislation to death. Depending on how much the rule is modified, it could mean also that from here on out it will be easier to pass civil-rights measures.

In a word, the once formidable southern caucus is slipping in its ability to bar the door to any given legislation, including a change in Senate rules.

The remarkable fact is that a month before the new Congress assembles, substantial doubt remains on only one point—how far the rules modification will go.

At present, the Senate's famed rule XXII requires a vote of two-thirds of the entire Senate (or 66 Members of the new 98-Member body) to halt debate. Small wonder that the rule never has been successfully invoked since it was last modified in 1949. In fact, only 4 times in the rule's entire history, dating from 1917, has it been used successfully.

How will the Senate alter this rule to make it easier to get legislative action?

At the very minimum, two-thirds of the Senators present and voting on any cloture (debate shutoff) motion are likely to be given authority to crack down on a filibuster. Supporting this limited change are the Senate's so-called moderates, led by Senate majority leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Democrat of Texas.

At the maximum, a majority of the total Senate (or 50 Members of the new 98-Member Senate), would be permitted to impose cloture after 15 days of debate. This alternative would permit cloture by two-thirds of those present and voting after only 2 days of debate. Each Senator, however, would be entitled to speak for 1 hour after cloture was voted.

Supporting this sharper restriction on the Senate's now almost unlimited right to talk is a bipartisan coalition of liberals. This group is headed by Illinois' PAUL DOUGLAS and Minnesota's HUBERT HUMPHREY on the Democratic side of the aisle, and New Jersey's CLIFFORD P. CASE and New York's JACOB K. (JACK) JAVITS in the GOP corner.

The Senate possibly will wind up voting for a rules change somewhere between these two major reform proposals. The extent of the modification will probably be determined by those 15 new Democrats and 3 new Republicans swept into the Senate in the November 4 election upheaval and last week's Alaskan election. These are the men who will hold the balance of power in the new Senate, which explains why their votes are being assiduously courted.

In wooing the new Members, the liberal bloc argues that anything less than authority to stop talkathons by a majority vote of the total Senate, after 15 days debate, would be virtually accepting the principle of the filibuster.

Seeking a milder modification, the moderates reply that the right of unlimited debate was once a part of refuge for the liberals themselves and could be so again if a conservative coalition returned to power in some future Congress.

The Senate struggle between these two groups—and, inevitably, a third bloc, the southern Senators opposed to any rules change—will get under way on January 7, the day the new Senate meets, on a dramatic collateral issue.

On that day the liberals will move, before the Senate can take up anything else, to proceed at once to the adoption of Senate rules for the session by a majority vote of the Senate.

This is the key motion on which the outcome of the rules fight may hinge. The theory of the motion is that the Senate is not a continuing body, despite its long tradition of continuing rules, but like the House, under the Constitution, must proceed to the adoption of its rules by majority vote every 2 years.

Twice before at the outset of a new Congress (Jan. 7, 1953, and Jan. 4, 1957), substantially the same bipartisan liberal bloc has presented the same motion only to have it shelved by a majority of the Senate.

But on the last try, two significant things happened. The thin line of 21 Senators supporting their original 1953 motion rose in 1957 to within striking distance of a majority (38 votes and 3 absentees who favored the move). The liberals now claim that gains in the November election will carry them well over the majority mark.

Of equal if not greater importance was the emergence of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, the Senate's chief presiding officer, as an ally of the bipartisan liberal bloc in the January 1957 showdown.

In an advisory opinion which had no immediate binding effect but held sweeping implications for the future, NIXON ruled that the liberal bloc leaders were proceeding in order when they moved at the outset of the session to adopt a new set of Senate rules.

More than that, NIXON ruled—and this was the really serious blow to the South's long reliance on rule 22—that section 2 of the rule, permitting endless debate on any motions to change the rules, was itself unconstitutional.

In so ruling, NIXON tolled the bell for rule 22 in its present form, and it was so recognized at the time. What he did in effect was to serve notice that if a point of order was ever raised on this question, he would uphold the point.

His ruling, of course, could be appealed to the Senate, but here is the interesting payoff. A simple majority of the Senators present and voting could uphold the Vice President's stand.

So, one way or another, history is very likely to be made when the new Senate, considerably freshened by 18 new faces, convenes on January 7.

If recent practice is followed, the Senate probably will proceed to swear in new Senators before taking up the question of rules.

The man who will make the test motion to "proceed to the consideration of Senate rules" will probably be Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, Democrat, of New Mexico, the Senator who made it in 1953 and 1957. If the motion is successful, the parliamentarians may be in for a field day, and so may the Senate.

Some of the tantalizing points raised by this situation are these:

What rules would the Senate use in proceeding to adopt new ones? Vice President NIXON has indicated that the Senate would continue to operate under the old rules, with the single exception of the so-called unconstitutional ban in rule XXII. In other words, he would hold that the Senate could write its new rules by majority vote.

Theoretically at this stage, extreme southerners could open a filibuster which conceivably could continue for days.

The opportunity would present itself even if a majority of northern liberals were clearly in control of the Senate. Presumably the southerners could propose an endless number of amendments to the rules and assert the right to speak at length on each one.

There is no guarantee that this will not happen, but the men who run the Senate can be counted on to do all in their power to reach some advance agreement to prevent the proceedings from degenerating to this point.

In the first place, thoughtful southerners are not anxious to stage an extended filibuster—knowing their chances for winning one at the start of a new session are practically nil.

The most realistic among them is probably none other than the chairman of the southern caucus himself, Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL (Democrat of Georgia). In a recent interview, RUSSELL virtually conceded that rule XXII will be modified to some degree, although he said he would oppose any change.

Will the southerners fall back on the filibuster as a weapon, in a dramatic sort of Custer's last stand?

Here again the answer may hinge on the degree of modification attempted.

Should the liberals decide to go for broke for majority vote cloture, king filibuster almost certainly will reign again in the Senate, albeit his days are numbered.

A more likely prospect is that the Senate's "liberals" and "moderates" will eventually get together, possibly in advance of the new session, on some effective debate limitation plan which can be imposed without a return to bedlam.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

I modify my resolution to the terms of the resolution submitted yesterday afternoon by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], for himself and other Senators, and in accordance with the printed text of that resolution. I do so in order that there may be no confusion about any legislative hiatus which has been suggested.

The House deals with this question of rules right along. Extensive claims are being made to the effect that there will be a legislative no man's land. In order that there may be no confusion, I adopt the language proposed yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania and other Senators, confining the final decision to rule XXII only, and moving to adopt the other rules in a body. I therefore modify my resolution in accordance with that statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his proposal.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have just read the new proposal, which is apparently the one which has been submitted by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] in behalf of the Senator from New Mexico and other Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield himself additional time?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not wish to be splitting hairs, but I doubt very much whether the Senator from Pennsylvania had the right to offer the substitute, although I do not raise any question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator raise a point of order?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I do not. I merely expressed a doubt as to whether he had the right to do so.

Mr. ANDERSON. I believe the Senator from Georgia is laboring under a misapprehension in that regard. I offered the motion to proceed to the adoption of rules on behalf of myself. The original one was submitted by 34 Senators.

Mr. RUSSELL. The amendment before us now is a substitute. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is the third edition?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; it is not the third edition.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from New Mexico originally had one of his own, as I understand. Perhaps I should say that originally some 34 Senators submitted a resolution. Then the Senator from New Mexico submitted one on behalf of himself. Now we have the present amendment which is before us.

Mr. ANDERSON. It was altered only because of the change in the situation. The Senator from Texas had a motion pending.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Texas had a resolution pending. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. The resolution of the Senator from Texas, the unfinished business, is a proposal to rewrite rule XXII. Is that not correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. That proposal is subject to amendment or substitution or change in any way in which a majority of the Senate see fit to act. Is that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes. However, the essential point which the Senator from Georgia overlooks is that this is now being done in accordance with the constitutional right of the Senate; the other is being done by way of sufferance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield himself additional time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I merely wish to observe that this matter has apparently almost reached the point of being ridiculous. If the Senator's amendment is adopted, from a parliamentary standpoint we would be where we would be if it had not been offered at all. Section 3 of the amendment states:

> Consideration of the form of rule XXII for the Senate of the 86th Congress shall be the next order of business of the Senate.

That is already the order of the business of the Senate. It eventually would have the effect of delaying the order of business which has already been proposed by the Senator from Texas, which is to change rule XXII. I am opposed to any change in rule XXII. However, the Johnson proposal is the pending business. It is a parliamentary fact that under the proposal of the Senator from Texas a majority of the Senate can work its will with respect to rule XXII. It can provide for a majority vote or a four-fifths or three-fifths vote, or take any other step it sees fit to take with respect to rule XXII. We have reached the stage of hairsplitting when it is said that the new proposal is in accordance with the Constitution. How did our present rules come into being? They came into being as a result of the constitutional provision which empowers the Senate to write its own rules. I do not know what all this shadowboxing means. Certainly under the original resolution offered by the Senator from Texas we can rewrite rule XXII. Unless it is a striving for pride of authorship, I do not know what this discussion is all about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the present discussion is one which offers great scope for the talents of lawyers and parliamentarians. As the Senate knows, we have in our midst many brilliant lawyers. We have among us many outstanding parliamentarians.

We have already heard from several of these able Members. Before we are done with this debate, I am sure that we shall have heard from them all. They will marshal the relevant precedents. Through them, great voices of the past which once thundered on the same issues may be expected to speak to us again. Some shall be made to speak on one side of the issues. Others on the other side. And still others on both sides. We shall hear not only from the able Senators from the North and the able Senators from the South who are with us today; we shall hear also from the able Senators of another era, from North, South, East and West.

That is the way with legal debate. It takes us back, far back into the past. The Senate is indeed fortunate in having so many brilliant lawyers, so many outstanding parliamentarians to serve as guides for those of us who are not lawyers. The experience of being led into the great treasure house of legal and parliamentary wisdom is indeed exhilarating and exalting. But, I regret to say, it is also exhausting. If it is exhausting to us who have some experience with parliamentary maneuver, I can imagine how it must strike those who have not, those who merely vote as citizens in the expectation that we shall act in a rational fashion in their behalf.

A debate on this plane, I fear, reaches a point of diminishing return and, eventually, a point of no return. Legal hairsplitting, at some point, begins to harm the head. What sets out to clarify begins to confuse. We find ourselves informed of all the legal, historic and parliamentary reasons for doing or not doing some particular thing. The only trouble is that, by that time, we have forgotten what it was that we had set out to do.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is not a brilliant lawyer; indeed, he is not a lawyer of any kind. Nor is he an outstanding parliamentarian, his experience in those matters being largely limited to many years of trying to convert bills in which his State is concerned into law.

But, if the Senator from Montana is neither lawyer nor parliamentarian, at least he has some experience with forestry. His State has some of the great forests of the Nation. Some of them are very large and very dense. To try to penetrate them is something akin to trying to penetrate the forest of words with which we are fast surrounding this issue. Before the growth becomes any more dense, the Senator from Montana believes that it is time to climb a tall tree, so to speak, and try to see where it is we are heading in this matter.

Mr. President, unless my perception deceives me, what is basically at issue in this discussion is not the continuity of the Senate. The issue is not civil rights. It is not even the majority will and how it is to be expressed in voting. The basic issue is far more profound and at the same time far more simple than is indicated by the debate which has so far taken place. What we are really concerned with is the place of the Senate in the pattern of political institutions which holds together this vast, complex, living and changing Nation. We shall not get on the main path of that issue, however, if we run down the sidepaths, deeper and deeper into the thickets of continuing body, civil rights and majority rule.

Consider for a moment, Mr. President, how much of this debate has already centered on the question of whether the Senate is or is not a continuing body. We have had or we shall have before we are finished references to McGrain against Dougherty, to "Jefferson's Manual," and to eminent writers and statesmen to prove that it is. And we have or we shall have reference to other court decisions, to the practices of long since forgotten Senators, and to other eminent writers and statesmen to prove that it is not.

But, Mr. President, the Senate is here, regardless of whether eminent gentlemen of the past or present say it is not supposed to be. We are here, Mr. President. This session of the Senate, as have the Senates in 85 Congresses before us, shall eventually get to its business. I should like to reassure our new colleagues on that point. The Senate is here, and it is here to stay.

We are not talking about the Senate as an institution when we talk about continuity; we are talking about the continuity of its actions and authority from one session of Congress to the next. Specifically, we are talking about the continuity of its rules. Let us be clear on that point. Let us not confuse continuity of the institution with continuity of its rules.

The facts in this matter are clear, Mr. President. Some action and authority of the Senate continues from Congress to Congress and some does not. As for its rules, Mr. President, let us say that the issue has never been clearly met. In this debate, there are some Members who apparently have a vested interest in proving that the rules do carry over and there are others who have a vested interest in proving that they do not. But what does our conscience tell us? What does reason tell us in this matter? Reason tells us that rules are made to serve those who must live with them. Since life changes, rules must be subject to change. Where rules are rules in perpetuity, we find not a living institution but an institution that is in or on its way to the graveyard of history.

To say that, Mr. President, is not the same as saying that we must turn our backs on the past. There is a line of political wisdom which stretches from the very beginning of this Nation to the present and the experiences of the Senate are a part of it. What logic dictates that the line—as far as the Senate is concerned—must be cut at the outset of each new Senate?

What this suggests with respect to the rules, Mr. President, is that it is wise that they be carried over from Congress to Congress, provided that they are amendable to rational change by those who must live and work with them in any given Congress. That is the real problem before us, and we must seek to solve it in a reasonable fashion, if for no other purpose than to obviate the need for this legal and parliamentary debate each time the Senate convenes in a new Congress. We do not help to solve it if we lose ourselves in the academic exercise of trying to determine whether or not the Senate continues, discontinues, or both continues and discontinues at the same time.

I trust that the Senate will be capable of meeting the real problem in a rational fashion. It would indeed be a sad day in the history of responsible government if we were to find ourselves so incapable of accommodation in this matter that we would have to turn to the courts for guidance.

Let us turn back, Mr. President, from the dead end of continuity in this forest of words. And let us see, too, that the issue before us is not civil rights. I can assure you, Mr. President, that I do not underestimate the importance of unresolved problems of civil rights to millions of Americans in all sections of the country or their particular importance to particular States of the Union. But that is not at issue here, even though civil rights may be profoundly affected by the outcome of this issue. I repeat: The fundamental issue in this debate is the place of the Senate in the pattern of political institutions which holds together the Nation. What affects that place undoubtedly will affect the problem of civil rights but it will also affect every other significant aspect of our society.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Montana 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I shall touch upon that basic question in a moment. Let me first, however, beckon the Senate to return from still another dubious path into which this debate has strayed. I refer to the contention that, in some fashion, "majority rule" is at stake. The concept of majority rule is one of the most sacred in the lexicon of freedom. It is also one of the most frequently distorted. Its use in this debate serves to befog, not to clarify, the fundamental issue: What, we may well ask ourselves, is the relevance of majority rule in this matter? We might well ask ourselves, as the distinguished journalist, Walter Lippmann, has asked: "A majority of what?" What kind of majority are we talking about?

Is a simple majority in the Senate to be construed as a sacred principle? If it is, we had better not stop in this debate at insisting upon this principle solely for the rules of the Senate. We had better go on. We had better proceed promptly to correct the inadvertence in the Constitution which requires a two-thirds vote of the Senate in matters of treaty ratification and confirmation of appointments. I hear no challenges to these provisions of the Constitution on the grounds of the sacredness of simple majority rule. Moreover, does this concept of simple majority rule as it applies in the Senate have any relationship to the premise of representative government that authority resides ultimately in a majority of the people? If it does, then we had better proceed promptly to the modification of still another aspect of the Constitution. We had better see to it that this body ceases to be composed of two Senators from each State. We had better see to it that the Senate's membership is apportioned, as is the membership of the House, on the basis of population. Then, at least, when we speak of majority rule being at issue in this matter, the phrase will have some relevance to the popular will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. No, Mr. President, we hear no clamor for a change in these constitutional provisions. Majority rule is no more at issue here than are the questions of the continuity of the Senate and civil rights. I come back to my point, Mr. President, that what is at issue in this matter is the place of the Senate, as one instrument among several, in the responsible Government of the United States.

What is it that the Senate is? Why do we have this institution? These are the questions which we must raise and answer before we can grapple intelligently with the problem of its rules.

Clearly, this institution is different from the Presidency and the Supreme Court. Perhaps less clearly but no less significantly it is different from the House of Representatives. We know the obvious difference between the two bodies. We know, Mr. President, that Representatives are elected for 2 years and that Senators are elected for 6. We know that Representatives are chosen by apportioned constituencies and we are chosen by States. We know that this is so, Mr. President, but have we thought of why this is so?

It is not enough to attribute the existence of the two different legislative bodies in our Government to the wisdom or whim of the Founding Fathers. They were not whimsical men. And wise as they were, they could not have foreseen the subsequent evolution of the Nation and its institutions in all its aspects. No, Mr. President, we cannot take refuge from thought on this matter under the cloak of what the Founding Fathers wanted us to do or not to do with the Senate of 1959. The Founding Fathers would have been the first to guide, but they would have been the last to try to control us. The job of understanding the role of the Senate today is our job, not theirs. It is essential that we ask ourselves what unique role it is that this great institution plays, must play, in the drama of responsible Government in the United States. One part of this role has been touched upon many times, in discussions and commentary on the nature of the Senate. We are, it is said, the long-termers; and we are the few. Some writers even go so far as to call us the solons. These characteristics presumably permit us to remain unmoved by the sudden tidal waves which from time to time descend upon the political life of popular government. So long as the Senate is, by its constitutional membership and longer tenure, insulated from these sudden swells of passion, it can spare the Nation from the impetuous reactions which the more responsive House may make to them. Or, so the reasoning goes.

I think that the record bears out the contention to some degree. In any event, as a Senator I can hardly resist such a flattering description of one of our functions.

Assuming that we do have the function of standing against the tidal waves, does it follow that, in the exercise of this function, the Senate may block the long tides of our history? That is not the exercise of the function; that is an abuse of the function. In that direction would lie tyranny, and it is against tyranny which the total complex of our institutions was designed to operate. In the end, any institution which sought to curb the long tides of freedom would not be tolerated by a free people.

If one function of the Senate, then, is to stand against the tidal waves without blocking the tides, another is to facilitate, to regulate the adjustment of all sections of the Nation to these tides. As the Senate knows, and as I have been at pains to emphasize here today, we do not represent the majority will of the national population. The Senate may be so composed in a particular Congress in such a fashion that it does. That, however, is incidental and irrelevant to the Senate's functions. We represent, Mr. President, not on the basis of total national population but on the basis of 49 separate and unequal segments of that population.

Now, what reason is there in that arrangement? Is there no reason in it, Mr. President? Is it simply a device which the Founding Fathers had to employ to obtain the original Union and all the generations which have come after have simply been saddled with it? I suggest, Mr. President, that such is not the case. I suggest that there was reason in the arrangement at the time it was established. I suggest that there is reason in it today.

There are strong bonds which unite all Americans, regardless of where they may live. But, let us face it: There are also sectional differences in predominant mores and customs, in predominant interests, hopes, and fears. This body, perhaps, more than any other in the Federal system should serve—indeed, it must serve—to prevent these differences from widening into unbridgeable gulfs. To put it another way, Mr. President, the parts of this huge Nation are uneven. They are also changing at an uneven rate. The Senate can do much to adjust these unevennesses. It can prevent them from producing irreparable schisms between the regions. It can prevent the North from running roughshod over the South or the South from trampling over the North, or the West from rolling over both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if we see the Senate, not as a representatives body in the sense of the House, but as body responsive to the uneven segments of the Nation; if we see it as a rock against tidal waves but not against the tides—if we see it in that fashion, we can arrive at the nub of the issue. We arrive at it not in the context of whether or not the Senate is a continuing body, not in the context of the problem of civil rights, or not in the context of majority rule. We arrive at it, rather, in the context of the living role of the Senate—the unique functions of the Senate—in the total scheme of the American constitutional system.

To discharge these unique functions, a primary tool of the Senate is the rule of full discussion. The tool is needed to inform; it is needed to prevent unthinking action.

There has been wise use of the instrument of full discussion in the Senate through the years. History is replete with examples, and we shall hear of them all before this debate is through. There has also been whimsical use and also abuse of this tool, and we shall hear examples of this as well.

Lest there be any doubt, what the Senate is now considering is a rule to curb the abusive use of this instrument of full discussion without impairing the unique functions of the Senate which depend so heavily upon it. Strip away the lawyer's arguments, strip away the parliamentary intricacies, and that is what remains. That is the issue.

Let me say, Mr. President, there is room for differences as to how we shall resolve the change, but, in my opinion, change is essential. For my part, Mr. President, I should rather move more slowly than more quickly in adjusting the instrument of full discussion. Even a slight change here is bound to have profound repercussions in the manner in which the Senate disposes of the great issues which will come before it.

As I have already made clear, I shall support the resolution of the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas]. That resolution, as the Senate knows, has two principal features. It seeks, first, to provide a rational way of avoiding an interminable wrangle over how to proceed each time a new Congress convenes. Second, it provides for cloture on the basis of a two-thirds vote of those present and voting. I disagree with those who argue that this is not a significant change; that it will simply restore the ineffectual procedure which operated before the even more stringent rule which has existed since 1949. Leaving aside the question of whether the pre-1949 practice was effective or ineffective, the fact is that this resolution, if I interpret it correctly, will mean one thing. It will mean what it says. It will mean that when two-thirds of the Members of this body say there has been enough debate, enough talk, then the talk shall end, without legal or parliamentary ifs, ands, or buts. I am confident, Mr. President, that if there is abuse or frivolous use of this essential tool, we shall find that from now on a sufficient proportion of the membership will be prepared to protect the dignity and the unique utility of this institution of the Senate in the Government of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I joined with the Senator from New Mexico in sponsoring the original resolution, which contemplated a declaration that would provide the power in each Senate, when it assembled in a new Congress, to adopt its own rules without restrictions imposed by preceding Senates. A considerable number of words have been spoken on this subject, and I am quite certain that I shall not be able to add much enlightenment to the subject. I feel, however, that I should give the reasons which motivated me in joining with the Senator from New Mexico and my other colleagues who sponsored the resolution.

I begin with the proposition that conceding the Senate is a continuing body, I would be remiss in the fulfillment of my responsibility if I did not also declare that the words and the provisions of the Constitution of the United States are continuing in life and power. To yield to the arguments which have been advanced that the Senate does not have the power to adopt its own rules except in compliance with restrictions imposed upon it by a preceding Senate would be to say bleakly that the Constitution of the United States adopted in 1787 is not living and applicable to the business which is to be transacted by the Senate in session in the year 1959.

The Constitution provides:

> Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings.

There are nine simple, plain, direct words, each having a connotation which is generally understood. Those words are direct. They do not require any external evidence to interpret the meaning which the framers of our Constitution had in mind when they wrote them.

> Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings.

The Senate is a House. It has the power to determine the rules of its proceedings. That power is absolute, unrestricted, and uninhibited by any declaration made by any preceding Senate. Those who wrote this provision chose plain, simple words. This provision lived and was full of strength when it was written. It has the same strength today.

It is with reluctance that I have reached my conclusion. But I have reached it because I am not an iconoclast. I believe in giving respect to the wisdom of those who preceded us. I am not one who rejects precedents, by saying that they are mere traces of where the cows walked, and that what was once a cowpath has now become a big highway. I revere the wisdom of the past; I want to follow it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). The time yielded to the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I have further time, Mr. President?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, the Senate can be a continuing body vested with all the forces and powers necessary for the establishment of stability. But while that is true, the constitutional provisions can also be a continuing, vital force, effective and operative with every Senate that meets for the many and eternal years our country will be in existence.

For the reasons I have given, Mr. President, I support the proposal of the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, how many minutes remain under my control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eleven minutes remain under the control of the Senator from Texas. Sixteen minutes remain under the control of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the initial form of the Anderson motion was perfectly plain, and would have cleared away the parliamentary underbrush, so that we could have proceeded to the substantive features of the proposals to check filibusters. The one objection which seemed to have any merit was that if all the rules were opened up at the beginning of a session, it might be possible for some Senators to indulge in a covert filibuster by proposing changes in rules other than rule XXII. So far as the proponents of the Anderson motion were concerned, there was no such danger; we were concerned only with amending rule XXII. However, we recognize the fact that if the Anderson motion should prevail, there might be opponents of the Anderson proposal who would propose other changes, with the purpose of preventing a full discussion of rule XXII and wearing out the patience of the public.

Therefore, the amendment the Senator from New Mexico submitted this morning provides that if his motion carries, the standing rules of the Senate for this Congress shall be the same as the standing rules of the Senate in the preceding Congress, with the exception of rule XXII. So the Anderson motion in its present form removes the last logical objection which could be made to it; and the issue now is a very stark and direct one, namely, are we going to maintain all the outer defenses in favor of the filibuster, which may, and probably will, prevent us from coming to a definite vote; or are we going to sweep away those outer defenses, and come immediately to the issue?

Mr. President, let me say that the whole country will be watching the vote which soon will be taken on the motion to lay on the table. That vote will be one of the decisive votes in this Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished minority whip, the able senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORTON in the chair). The Senator from California is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, now pending before the Senate is the modified proposal, accepted a very few minutes ago by the Senator from New Mexico. It is simple, and it is clear. First, it recognizes that the Senate, under the United States Constitution, has the right to adopt rules. Then, after recognizing that constitutional right, it accepts and adopts the rules of the preceding Senate as the rules for the current Senate, with, however, one clear exception set forth in part in the last three lines of the proposal now before us which read as follows:

> Consideration of the form of rule XXII for the Senate of the 86th Congress shall be the next order of business of the Senate.

That is what is before us.

Mr. President, my service here has been short; but in 6 years I have seen filibusters. As an American Senator, I do not like them. I do not think the American people like them. I wish to see complete debate had on every public question; but complete debate is not at all repugnant to the Senate now assuming the responsibility of adopting rules, and particularly the responsibility of adopting a change in rule XXII, so long and woefully overdue.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield to my able friend from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I have listened with interest and at considerable length to the explanations of what this proposal will do. Let me ask this question: If the amended or changed proposal closes the Pandora's box for this particular session, is it not true, however, that the first part, with its declaration, will open the Pandora's box for every succeeding new Congress?

Mr. KUCHEL. I wish to answer as best I can the question the able Senator from South Dakota has asked.

First, if there is a Pandora's box involved here, which I deny, the Pandora's box is grounded in the Constitution of the United States, which gives the Senate the responsibility of determining by what rules it desires the transaction of the public business to be governed. Here, however, in an effort to eliminate the so-called Pandora's box argument, the pending proposal provides that the Senate accept its constitutional responsibility to adopt its rules, and, after accepting that responsibility, adopt the rules of the Senate in the preceding Congress, with one exception.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield the Senator from California 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the distinguished assistant minority leader for his excellent statement.

If I may, I should like to refer to the question raised a moment ago by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], I think the answer the Senator from California gave to it was a correct one. But, in addition, does he not agree with me that the question about a Pandora's box is based upon the argument that Senators in succeeding Congresses are going to be completely irresponsible?

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator from New Jersey is correct; and in asking that question, I think he demonstrates the complete invalidity of the so-called Pandora's box argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time yielded to the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has 9 minutes remaining. The Senator from Texas has 10 minutes remaining, exclusive of the time yielded to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the vote which I shall cast on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico that the Senate proceed, under article 1, section 5, to the adoption of rules, will require me, regretfully, to fail to support him. Two years ago, when I voted against the motion to table his motion, substantially identical on its face, I supported my good friend from New Mexico.

I desire briefly to outline the considerations which impelled me then, and those which impel me now. Although my vote will be different, my position remains unchanged.

There is a difference, a critical difference, in the alternatives the Senate then faced—and the alternatives before us now. In 1957, simply stated, the choice before the Senate was to retain or not to retain rule XXII as it then was framed. Realistically, it was then apparent that the Senate would not get another opportunity in the 85th Congress to vote for a changed rule XXII. The various proposals offered for amendment of rule XXII all were referred to the Rules Committee. Senate Resolution 17, Senate Resolution 19, and Senate Resolution 21 all were offered and referred on January 7. Senate Resolution 28, Senate Resolution 29, Senate Resolution 30, and Senate Resolution 32 all were offered and referred on January 9. None of these proposals ever reached the floor.

A different situation now prevails. The Senate is now in a position to rewrite rule XXII as it will. It can act upon Senate Resolution 5, or upon amendments or substitutes for it, all without intervening committee reference, unless a majority of the Senate orders such reference to be made.

In 1959, the circumstances differ from those which obtained in 1957. I expect to have the opportunity to vote for a liberalization of rule XXII regardless of the outcome of the vote on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

I made my position clear as to the amendment to rule XXII, which I favor, when, 2 years ago, on January 9, 1957, I sponsored, with a number of other Senators, Senate Resolution 30.

The provisions of Senate Resolution 5 now before the Senate are identical with the provisions of Senate Resolution 30, which I sponsored in 1957. This is the amendment of rule XXII which I now favor and which I expect to have the opportunity to have passed upon by a majority vote in the Senate. It is the amendment to rule XXII which I shall support.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to address myself primarily to the newly elected Members of the Senate. I suspect that those gentlemen are about half as confused as I was when I became a Member of this body 2 years ago and had to face up to this difficult problem.

There is a vital difference between the Johnson and Anderson proposals. The Anderson motion preserves the right of new Senators, and the right of every other Senator, to have a voice every 2 years, this year included, to determine the rules under which the Senate will proceed.

The Johnson resolution will not do that. If adopted in its present form, it would mean there could be a filibuster if we wanted to change the rules in 1961.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] has said that the majority could work its will on rule XXII. With due deference to the Senator from Georgia, I say that is not the case, because it is almost an impossible task for the majority to work its will, under rule XXII, when nearly 66 votes are required to break a filibuster.

Pandora's box is closed by the Anderson motion, and, if adopted, it will make it possible for this body, as is true of every other civilized parliamentary body today, to proceed to make its own rules and be free to add to, change, or amend the rules of this body if it desires to do so at the beginning of each session. I hope the motion of the Senator from New Mexico will be adopted.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, in the debate yesterday afternoon I was shocked to learn that of those Senators who had voted to impose this extremely restrictive cloture rule on this body in 1949, as we were informed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] yesterday, at least 60 of the present Members of this body had no voice in the imposition of that unconstitutional rule.

I agree with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. We had to meet this issue head on when we met in the Senate 2 years ago. The question arose in my mind as to what right I had, representing the people of my State, to waive a constitutional privilege. That is the real issue. I shall have to assert the privilege now or I shall have waived it.

That is the very purpose of the Anderson motion. It does not state that we cannot proceed to enact other legislation. It does not mean we shall not have an opportunity to vote for majority vote, for a constitutional two-thirds vote, or for any other similar percentage measure. However, we shall meet that question later. This is an entirely separate issue.

This proposal came up in 1953. Only 21 Senators asserted their contitutional privilege at that time. The attempt was defeated, but that did not stop us. So again in 1957, 38 votes were recorded by those exercising their constitutional privilege.

All I am suggesting to the new Members of the Senate is that this is the time to stand, to assert, and to exercise your constitutional privilege. If our effort is knocked down, this undoubtedly will be an issue in the 1960 election campaign. Also, if we are defeated in this attempt we shall have established another precedent for the Senate convening in 1961.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as we proceed to a vote on the Anderson motion, there are two fundamental questions before us. Question No. 1 is the Pandora's box question. According to the generally agreed opinion, we have the opportunity to close Pandora's box by voting for the Anderson proposal. What we vote now will bind the Senate when it meets 2 years from now.

The second question is, What is the difference between the Anderson and the Johnson proposals? If the Anderson motion is adopted, rule XXII will be debated under the Constitution, which means that action will be taken by a majority vote. If the Anderson motion is rejected and the Johnson proposal is adopted, the Senate will still be operating under the existing rule XXII, unless a majority in this Chamber chooses to sustain the Vice President.

Those of us who are for a meaningful change in the rules, in view of the fact that the Johnson resolution will bind future Congresses, should take this clear opportunity to lay that question at rest. Those are the two issues. Those who are in favor of a meaningful change in rule XXII should vote for the Anderson motion.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I simply desire to make my own position in this matter clear. I have on several other occasions discussed this matter at great length. I feel implicitly that the constitutional provision gives the Senate the right to change its rules. I shall support the Anderson motion.

While I do not agree with my colleagues who believe cloture should be invoked by a majority under some circumstances, nevertheless I will later support a measure in the general terms of that which the majority leader offered the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I yield such time as remains to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for the remainder of the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of my colleagues to the question: Why is it we have before us today Senate Resolution 5, the so-called Johnson resolution? Why did we not have Senate Resolution 5, may I say, offered in the 85th Congress? I will tell my colleagues why. It is because at the time of the 85th Congress no Member of the Senate thought we would ever be able to change rule XXII, because of the nature of that rule despite its unconstitutional features, but the 38 votes on the Anderson resolution in 1957 made some Members of this body think, "Perhaps we had better come up with something, or we who are sponsors of Senate Resolution 5 are apt to have something we do not want."

If we turn back the Anderson motion today, if we reject it and ultimately accept Senate Resolution 5, we are going to nail down again the kind of inflexibility and the kind of inaction from which we have suffered in this body for years. Whatever 1957 may have done in terms of the Senate rules, the 38 votes cast then were 38 votes of Senators who believed in constitutional procedures in the United States Senate, which finally made possible Senate Resolution 5 today.

Mr. President, I wish to answer one other little point. I listened to the argument with respect to Pandora's box and the statement that if we did what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] asked us to do originally we would open wide Pandora's box. This is an insult to the Founding Fathers of our Government, who held a Constitutional Convention without the Senate rules. The Founding Fathers were able to design a rather important document without the use of Senate rules. In fact, Mr. President, the constitutional fathers, regardless of what the Senate rules might be, said, "Each House may decide what kind of rules it wants."

I have all the admiration in the world for my distinguished friends and colleagues who are opposed to the Anderson motion, but in this instance I am going to line up on the side of George Washingington, Benjamin Franklin, and a few others at the Constitutional Convention. I am afraid I have to admit publicly they may have had more wisdom about these matters than some of us who now sit in the Senate.

Finally, Mr. President, the issue involved here is an issue of the Federal principle. I repeat, I am rather surprised to find that those who have argued for States rights and that those who have said each Senator must be considered a representative of a sovereign State are willing to disenfranchise any one who did not happen to be in the Senate at the time the rules were adopted. If there were ever a kind of paradox in the life of the Senate it is now. Now we have to argue for the protection of States rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield myself the time remaining to me.

Mr. President, this discussion has been full and complete. I am amazed, surprised and shocked that some of our Members failed to realize that we are already where we would be if the Anderson motion were adopted. We do not have to adopt the Anderson motion in order to have an opportunity to amend rule XXII. We have been trying to amend the rule for 2 or 3 days. We have had rather full discussion of it. All the Anderson motion would do, would be at one fell swoop, to adopt all the old rules, and to put the stamp of approval of the Senate on rule XXV, which provides that there shall be 8 Democrats and 7 Republicans on each committee.

Mr. President, I know Senators do not want to do that. We are going to have an amendment to rule XXV as soon as we get through with rule XXII. We are going to have an amendment to rule XXXII, I trust. This new-born baby which arrived some time in the twilight hours, which is on our desks this morning, again confirms the danger of following the impetuous course outlined in the Anderson motion.

Mr. President, there is one way to amend rule XXII, and that way is to vote on it. We are prepared to vote on it. We have at the desk a resolution, sponsored by several Members of this body, which provides that cloture can apply to rule changes; which substitutes a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting for two-thirds of the Senators sworn; and which provides that the Senate rules shall continue from one Congress to another.

I was amazed, Mr. President, after we decided that we were going to take up rule XXII, to learn that many experienced Senators believed that in order to amend a rule it was necessary to have a two-thirds vote. Many experienced Senators—and I heard some of them speak this morning—apparently did not realize that the Senate at almost each session amends its rules. Many experienced Senators did not realize that any time any Senator wants to amend any rule he can do so if he has a majority vote and can get a vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. If he can get a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would remind my friends who have been here for some time that we have been getting votes. In the last Congress for the first time in 80 years we passed a civil rights bill. That was supposed to be the reason for changing rule XXII, yet we passed it under rule XXII. We did get votes. We got votes of every conceivable kind. We got so many votes that the whole Nation wondered what all this propaganda was about, when it was said that the Senate could not work its will or that a majority could not work its will. The Senate voted on part III of the civil rights bill. It voted on the jury trial provision. We listened and we learned. We searched and got the facts. We did what a majority of this body thought it ought to do. We did not make anybody do anything.

I think there should be an opportunity to close debate on a rule change. Whether we ought to close debate by a majority vote or a two-thirds vote or a three-fourths vote is for the Senate to decide, but we can decide it. We are going to decide it, in my opinion, just as soon as we get through running around Robin Hood's barn and going up the hill and down the hill.

I do not know why any Member of the Senate should want to say to the new Members that on this, the 9th day of January, we are going to provide that the standing rules of the Senate of the 86th Congress shall be the same as the standing rules of the Senate of the 85th Congress other than rule XXII. I do not want the rules to be the same. We won an election. We have twice as many Senators as the other side has. We are entitled to twice the representation on committees the other side has.

Under the modified Anderson motion apparently its effect on Rule XXV has not been considered because we are asked to vote to have an 8 to 7 committee membership instead of a 10 to 5 committee membership. Where are the parliamentarians? Where are the thinkers? It is proposed to act on a moment's notice on 40 rules and say, "We want them all to remain as they are for the rest of this Congress, except for rule XXII."

We can change rule XXII, and we shall have plenty of opportunity to change rule XXII. In my opinion, it will be changed in at least two respects, and perhaps more. Whether we impose cloture by majority vote will be up to the majority of the Senate. Whether it will be by a two-thirds vote will also be up to a majority of the Senate.

I have said to my colleagues that the sponsors of this resolution on this side of the aisle are prepared to meet at 10 o'clock in the morning and remain in session until late in the evening, until we reach a vote on an amendment to rule XXII. That is all any Senator ought to ask. That is all any Senator ought to want. Any Senator ought to know, if he does not, that a majority of the Senate can amend the rules, has done so, and will continue to do so at any time the majority votes to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired. All time has expired.

Under the order previously entered, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the modified amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], in the nature of a substitute for Senate Resolution 5.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Cotton	Holland
Allott	Curtis	Hruska
Anderson	Dirksen	Humphrey
Bartlett	Dodd	Jackson
Beall	Douglas	Javits
Bennett	Dworshak	Johnson, Tex.
Bible	Eastland	Johnston, S. C.

Murray	Scott	Yarborough
Muskie	Smathers	Young, N. Dak.
O'Mahoney	Smith	Young, Ohio
Pastore	Sparkman
Prouty	Stennis

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. First, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, the vote will be on the Johnson motion to lay on the table the most recent proposal of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], namely, his modified amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate Resolution 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] to lay on the table the modified amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, in the nature of a substitute for Senate Resolution 5.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. So a vote "yea" is a vote to table, and a vote "nay" is a vote against tabling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

The motion is not debatable. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHURCH (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If he were present and voting he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—60

Bartlett	Frear	Martin
Bennett	Fulbright	McClellan

NOT VOTING—2

Church Neuberger

So the motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion of the Senator from Montana to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to inform the Senate that at about 12:10 o'clock we will proceed to the Chamber of the other body. After hearing the President's address, we plan to return to the Senate Chamber. Then it will be in order for Senators to introduce bills and submit resolutions.

We expect to ask the Senate to stay in session late this evening, in the hope that a vote can be reached on some of the amendments to rule XXII. If all Senators who wish to offer amendments to rule XXII will return to the Chamber, we shall consider whatever amendments may be called up and try to dispose of them as early as possible.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there is one civil right which cannot be alien to anyone, and that is the celebration of a man's birthday. Today is the 46th anniversary of the birth of the Vice President of the United States. [Applause, Senators rising.]

I recall when RICHARD NIXON came to the House of Representatives in the 80th Congress. I remember, although I was not there then, that he served in the 81st Congress; that he came to the Senate in 1950; and that he graces his present chair by a determination of the people in 1952.

So I think we should fittingly observe this day, the birth anniversary of the Vice President of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I join with the distinguished minority leader in wishing the Vice President a very happy birthday. I did not realize that this was his birthday; otherwise I would have extended my best wishes to him earlier. I hope he enjoys the day.

The Senate is a great body, over which he presides with dignity. There is no one in the country who, I think, is more concerned with the problems of our country and their solution than the distinguished occupant of the chair. Although upon occasions we find ourselves in disagreement, we never find ourselves disagreeable.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague, the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], and myself, let the record clearly show that the people of California, and the country, wholeheartedly salute the Vice President of the United States, a distinguished son of the State of California, on the occasion of the anniversay of his birthday.

Let one from Anaheim say to a distinguished American from Yorba Linda, just a few miles away: Many happy returns of the day, Mr. Vice President.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I simply wish to add to what the Senator from California has said that his remarks extend beyond the limits of California and include the best wishes of the people of the entire country.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would not want the opportunity to pass without calling attention to the fact that the distinguished Vice President spent several years of his life in Arizona and has been made the healthy, intelligent man he is by Arizona's water. [Laughter.]

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 5) proposing to amend Senate rules XXII and XXXII.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Is the business now before the Senate the Johnson resolution? Is that now the pending business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct. I assume the Vice President will confirm my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I apologize to my friend, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. He had asked for a brief time in which to speak before the debate on the motion to table was concluded. I forgot that completely. I just looked in his direction and was reminded of that fact. I assure him that I will try not to make that error again. I was very much concerned about the motion to table and almost forgot to make it. I will yield now to the Senator from Arkansas if he desires to say anything at this time, or desires to have his statement appear in the RECORD.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No; I will speak later.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Understanding that the pending business is the consideration of Senate Resolution 5, the so-called Johnson resolution, will amendments to that resolution be in order if they deal with rules other than rule XXII and rule XXXII, which are mentioned in that resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless previous notice has been given, amendments will not be in order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yesterday I gave notice of an intent to offer a motion which would change rule XIX to provide a rule of germaneness. Would it be in order for me to offer that motion, if I determined to do so, as an amendment to the Johnson resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment or motion of the Senator from South Dakota would be in order in view of the fact that he has given 1 day's notice.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In view of the fact that not many Senators were in the Chamber at the time my notice was read yesterday, may I be recognized at this time to read the content of the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from South Dakota may proceed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The motion to establish a rule of germaneness, of which I gave notice yesterday, and which I am debating whether to offer as an amendment to the Johnson resolution or to ask that it come up later separately, reads as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND THE RULES

In accordance with the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention hereafter to submit a resolution proposing to amend rule XIX, relating to debate, by inserting after paragraph No. 1 of the said rule the new paragraph, No. 2, as follows:

"2. At any time during the consideration of a bill, resolution, or other matter pending before the Senate, it shall be in order to offer a motion that the Senate proceed with the consideration of amendments, which motion shall be privileged and decided with not more than 1 hour of debate, to be equally divided between opponents and proponents.

"If such a motion shall be determined in the affirmative, any amendment thereafter proposed, together with debate thereon, and all debate under the order for pending business shall be required to be germane to the subject matter before the Senate. All questions of relevancy under this rule, when raised, including appeals, shall be decided without debate.

"Change the numbers of the succeeding paragraphs of the rule.

"The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide for the consideration and germaneness of amendments, together with debate thereon, to a matter pending before the Senate."

Mr. President, that proposal, if adopted as a rule, would, I think, go to the heart of the question of delay in the business of the Senate. It would require the same germaneness as we now seek occasionally to get by unanimous consent. It would not establish a time limitation for debate, but it would require that amendments and debate on the pending business be germane. I think it would save a great deal of time for the Senate. It would move our business with more expedition and dispatch. I commend my proposal to consideration and study by the Members of the Senate.

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair; after which the Senate will proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate will stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

(At 12 o'clock noon, the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair; and at 12 o'clock and 9 minutes p.m. the Senate was called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair).)

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 1, the Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives, to assemble in joint session to hear the message of the President of the United States.

Thereupon, the Senate, preceded by the Secretary (Felton M. Johnston), the Sergeant at Arms (Joseph C. Duke), the Vice President, and the President pro tempore, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of attending the joint session to hear the address to be delivered by the President of the United States of America.

(For the address delivered by the President, see House proceedings in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The joint session of the two Houses having been dissolved, the Senate returned to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m., and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and resolutions, the submission of petitions and memorials, and the transaction of other routine business, with statements limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today, it adjourn until 10 a. m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF LEND-LEASE OPERATIONS — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, received by the Secretary of the Senate on November 24, 1958, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the "Thirty-ninth Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations" covering the calendar year 1957.

Most of the countries are making scheduled payments on their lend-lease accounts. During 1957, collections and credits on these accounts amounted to $28,340,686.34, comprising payments of $13,996,262.83 on principal and $14,344,423.51 on interest.

All of the lend-lease silver returned to the United States during 1957 had not been assayed by December 31, 1957. The amount assayed totaled 89,779,704.01 fine troy ounces.

Details on these and other lend-lease activities are provided in the report.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, November 24, 1958.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES SUBMITTED DURING SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT

Under authority of the order of the Senate of August 24, 1958, Mr. SMATHERS, from the Select Committee on Small Business, submitted on September 30, 1958, a report (No. 2499) entitled "The Role of Small Business in Defense Missile Procurement," which was printed.

Under authority of the order of the Senate of August 24, 1958, Mr. FULBRIGHT, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, on October 10, 1958, submitted a report (No. 2500), entitled "Federal Reserve Policy and Economic Stability 1951–57," which was printed.

Under authority of the order of the Senate of August 1, 1958, Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, on October 13, 1958, submitted a report (No. 2501) entitled "Control and Reduction of Armaments," which was printed.

Under authority of the order of the Senate of August 21, 1958, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, on October 13, 1958, submitted a report (No. 2502) of that committee, entitled "Summary of Activities," which was printed.
